ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

It would have given me, fellow-citizens, great satisfaction to announce, in the moment of your meeting, that the difficulties in our foreign relations, existing at the time of your last separation, had been amicably and justly terminated. I lost no time in taking those measures which were most likely to bring them to such a termination, by special missions, charged with such powers and instructions as, in the event of failure, could leave no imputation on either our moderation or forbearance. The delays which have since taken place in our negotiations with the British Government appear to have proceeded from causes which do not forbid the expectation that, during the course of the session, I may be enabled to lay before you their final issue. What will be that of the negotiations for settling our differences with Spain, nothing which had taken place at the date of the last despatches enables us to pronounce. On the western side of the Mississippi she advanced in considerable force, and took post at the settlement of Bayou Pierre, on the Red river. This village was originally settled by France, was held by her as long as she held Louisiana, and was delivered to Spain only as a part of Louisiana. Being small, insulated, and distant, it was not observed, at the moment of re-delivery to France and the United States, that she continued a guard of half a dozen men, which had been stationed there. A proposition, however, having been lately made by our Commander-in-Chief, to assume the Sabine river as a temporary line of separation between the troops of the two nations until the issue of our negotiations shall be known, this has been referred by the Spanish commandant to his superior, and in the mean time he has withdrawn his force to the western side of the Sabine river. The correspondence on this subject, now communicated, will exhibit more particularly the present state of things in that quarter.

The nature of that country requires indispensably that an unusual proportion of the force employed there should be cavalry or mounted infantry. In order, therefore, that the commanding officer might be enabled to act with effect, I had authorized him to call on the Governors of Orleans and Mississippi for a corps of five hundred volunteer cavalry. The temporary arrangement he has proposed may perhaps render this unnecessary. But I inform you, with great pleasure, of the promptitude with which the inhabitants of those Territories have tendered their services in defence of their country. It has done honor to themselves, entitled them to the confidence of their fellow-citizens in every part of the Union, and must strengthen the general determination to protect them efficaciously under all circumstances which may occur.

Having received information that, in another part of the United States, a great number of private individuals were combining together, arming and organizing themselves contrary to law, to carry on a military expedition against the territories of Spain, I thought it necessary, by proclamation, as well as by special orders, to take measures for preventing and suppressing this enterprise, for seizing the vessels, arms, and other means provided for it, and for arresting and bringing to justice its authors and abettors. It was due to that good faith which ought ever to be the rule of action in public as well as in private transactions, it was due to good order and regular government that, while the public force was acting strictly on the defensive, and merely to protect our citizens from aggression, the criminal attempts of private individuals to decide, for their country, the question of peace or war, by commencing active and unauthorized hostilities, should be promptly and efficaciously suppressed.

Whether it will be necessary to enlarge our regular force will depend on the result of our negotiations with Spain; but, as it is uncertain when that result will be known, the provisional measures requisite for that, and to meet any pressure intervening in that quarter, will be a subject for your early consideration.

The possession of both banks of the Mississippi reducing to a single point the defence of that river, its waters, and the country adjacent, it becomes highly necessary to provide, for that point, a more adequate security. Some position above its mouth, commanding the passage of the river, should be rendered sufficiently strong to cover the armed vessels which may be stationed there for defence; and, in conjunction with them, to present an insuperable obstacle to any force attempting to pass. The approaches to the city of New Orleans, from the eastern quarter also, will require to be examined, and more effectually guarded. For the internal support of the country, the encouragement of a strong settlement on the western side of the Mississippi, within reach of New Orleans, will be worthy the consideration of the Legislature.

The gunboats authorized by an act of the last session are so advanced that they will be ready for service in the ensuing Spring. Circumstances permitted us to allow the time necessary for their more solid construction. As a much larger number will still be wanting to place our seaport towns and waters in that state of defence to which we are competent, and they entitled, a similar appropriation for a further provision for them is recommended for the ensuing year.

A further appropriation will also be necessary for repairing fortifications already established, and the erection of such other works as may have real effect in obstructing the approach of an enemy to our seaport towns, or their remaining before them.

In a country whose Constitution is derived from the will of the people, directly expressed by their free suffrages, where the principal Executive functionaries, and those of the Legislature, are renewed by them at short periods, where, under the character of jurors, they exercise in person the greatest portion of the Judiciary powers, where the laws are consequently so formed and administered as to bear with equal weight and favor on all, restraining no man in the pursuits of honest industry, and securing to every one the property which that acquires, it would not be supposed that any safeguards could be needed against insurrection, or enterprise, on the public peace or authority. The laws, however, aware that these should not be trusted to moral restraints only, have wisely provided punishment for these crimes when committed. But would it not be salutary to give also the means of preventing their commission? Where an enterprise is meditated by private individuals against a foreign nation in amity with the United States, powers of prevention, to a certain extent, are given by the laws; would they not be as reasonable and useful where the enterprise preparing is against the United States? While adverting to this branch of law it is proper to observe, that, in enterprises meditated against foreign nations, the ordinary process of binding to the observance of the peace and good behaviour, could it be extended to acts to be done out of the jurisdiction of the United States, would be effectual in some cases where the offender is able to keep out of sight every indication of his purpose which could draw on him the exercise of the powers now given by law.

The States on the coast of Barbary seem generally disposed at present to respect our peace and friendship: with Tunis alone some uncertainty remains. Persuaded that it is our intention to maintain our peace with them on equal terms, or not at all, I propose to send, in due time, a reinforcement into the Mediterranean, unless previous information shall show it to be unnecessary.

We continue to receive proofs of the growing attachment of our Indian neighbors, and of their disposition to place all their interests under the patronage of the United States. These dispositions are inspired by their confidence in our justice, and in the sincere concern we feel for their welfare. And as long as we discharge these high and honorable functions with the integrity and good faith which alone can entitle us to their continuance, we may expect to reap the just reward in their peace and friendship.

The expedition of Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, for exploring the river Missouri, and the best communication from that to the Pacific ocean, has had all the success which could have been expected. They have traced the Missouri nearly to its source, descended the Columbia to the Pacific ocean, ascertained with accuracy the geography of that interesting communication across our continent, learnt the character of the country, of its commerce, and inhabitants; and it is but justice to say, that Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, and their brave companions, have, by this arduous service, deserved well of their country.

The attempt to explore the Red river, under the direction of Mr. Freeman, though conducted with a zeal and prudence meeting entire approbation, has not been equally successful. After proceeding up it about six hundred miles, nearly as far as the French settlements had extended, while the country was in their possession, our geographers were obliged to return without completing their work.

Very useful additions have also been made to our knowledge of the Mississippi, by Lieutenant Pike, who had ascended it to its source, and whose journal and map, giving the details of his journey, will shortly be ready for communication to both Houses of Congress. Those of Messrs. Lewis, Clarke, and Freeman, will require further time to be digested and prepared. These important surveys, in addition to those before possessed, furnish materials for commencing an accurate map of the Mississippi and its western waters. Some principal rivers, however, remain still to be explored, towards which the authorization of Congress, by moderate appropriations, will be requisite.

I congratulate you, fellow-citizens, on the approach of the period at which you may interpose your authority, Constitutionally, to withdraw the citizens of the United States from all further participation in those violations of human rights which have been so long continued on the unoffending inhabitants of Africa, and which the morality, the reputation, and the best interests of our country, have long been eager to proscribe. Although no law you may pass can take prohibitory effect till the day of the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, yet the intervening period is not too long to prevent, by timely notice, expeditions which cannot be completed before that day.

The receipts at the Treasury, during the year ending on the 30th day of September last, have amounted to nearly fifteen millions of dollars, which have enabled us, after meeting the current demands, to pay two millions seven hundred thousand dollars of the American claims, in part of the price of Louisiana; to pay of the funded debt, upwards of three millions of principal, and nearly four of interest; and, in addition, to reimburse, in the course of the present month, nearly two millions of five and a half per cent. stock. These payments and reimbursements of the funded debt, with those which had been made in the four years and a half preceding, will, at the present year, have extinguished upwards of twenty-three millions of principal.

The duties composing the Mediterranean fund will cease, by law, at the end of the present session. Considering, however, that they are levied chiefly on luxuries, and that we have an impost on salt, a necessary of life, the free use of which otherwise is so important, I recommend to your consideration the suppression of the duties on salt, and the continuation of the Mediterranean fund instead thereof, for a short time, after which that also will become unnecessary for any purpose now within contemplation.

When both of these branches of revenue shall in this way be relinquished, there will still, ere long, be an accumulation of moneys in the Treasury beyond the instalments of public debt which we are permitted by contract to pay. They cannot, then, without a modification, assented to by the public creditors, be applied to the extinguishment of this debt, and the complete liberation of our revenues, the most desirable of all objects; nor, if our peace continues, will they be wanting for any other existing purpose. The question, therefore now comes forward: To what other objects shall these surplusses be appropriated, and the whole surplus of impost, after the entire discharge of the public debt, and during those intervals when the purposes of war shall not call for them! Shall we suppress the impost, and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures! On a few articles, of more general and necessary use, the suppression, in due season, will doubtless be right, but the great mass of the articles on which impost is paid are foreign luxuries, purchased by those only who are rich enough to afford themselves the use of them. Their patriotism would certainly prefer its continuance and application to the great purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the Constitutional enumeration of federal powers. By these operations new channels of communication will be opened between the States; the lines of separation will disappear; their interests will be identified and their Union cemented by new and indissoluble ties. Education is here placed among the articles of public care, not that it would be proposed to take its ordinary branches out of the hands of private enterprise, which manages so much better all the concerns to which it is equal; but a public institution can alone supply those sciences which, though rarely called for, are yet necessary to complete the circle, all the parts of which contribute to the improvement of the country, and some of them to its preservation. The subject is now proposed for the consideration of Congress, because, if approved by the time the State Legislatures shall have deliberated on this extension of the federal trusts, and the laws shall be passed and other arrangements made for their execution, the necessary funds will be on hand, and without employment. I suppose an amendment to the Constitution, by consent of the States, necessary, because the objects now recommended are not among those enumerated in the Constitution, and to which it permits the public moneys to be applied.

The present consideration of a national establishment, for education particularly, is rendered proper by this circumstance; also that, if Congress, approving the proposition, shall yet think it more eligible to found it on a donation of lands, they have it now in their power to endow it with those which will be among the earliest to produce the necessary income. This foundation would have the advantage of being independent on war, which may suspend other improvements, by requiring for its own purposes the resources destined for them.

This, fellow-citizens, is the state of the public interests at the present moment, and according to the information now possessed. But such is the situation of the nations of Europe, and such, too, the predicament in which we stand with some of them, that we cannot rely with certainty on the present aspect of our affairs, that may change from moment to moment during the course of your session, or after you shall have separated. Our duty is therefore to act upon things as they are, and to make a reasonable provision for whatever they may be. Were armies to be raised whenever a speck of war is visible in our horizon, we never should have been without them. Our resources would have been exhausted on dangers which have never happened, instead of being reserved for what is really to take place. A steady, perhaps a quickened, pace in preparations for the defence of our seaport towns and waters, an early settlement of the most exposed and vulnerable parts of our country, a militia so organized, that its effective portions can be called to any point in the Union, or volunteers instead of them, to serve a sufficient time, are means which may always be ready, yet never preying on our resources until actually called into use. They will maintain the public interests while a more permanent force shall be in course of preparation. But much will depend on the promptitude with which these means can be brought into activity. If war be forced upon us, in spite of our long and vain appeal to the justice of nations, rapid and vigorous movements in its outset will go far towards securing us in its course and issue, and towards throwing its burdens on those who render necessary the resort from reason to force.

The result of our negotiations, or such incidents in their course as may enable us to infer their probable issue; such further movements, also, on our western frontiers as may show whether war is to be pressed there while negotiation is protracted elsewhere, shall be communicated to you from time to time, as they become known to me; with whatever other information I possess, or may receive, which may aid your deliberations on the great national interests committed to your charge.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 2, 1806.

The Message and documents therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration, and three hundred copies thereof printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, December 3.

DANIEL SMITH, from the State of Tennessee, attended.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I have the satisfaction to inform you that the negotiation between the United States and the Government of Great Britain is proceeding in a spirit of friendship and accommodation, which promises a result of mutual advantage. Delays indeed have taken place, occasioned by the long illness and subsequent death of the British Minister charged with that duty. But the Commissioners appointed by that Government to resume the negotiation have shown every disposition to hasten its progress. It is, however, a work of time, as many arrangements are necessary to place our future harmony on stable grounds. In the mean time, we find, by the communications of our Plenipotentiaries, that a temporary suspension of the act of the last session prohibiting certain importations, would, as a mark of candid disposition on our part, and of confidence in the temper and views with which they have been met, have a happy effect on its course. A step so friendly will afford further evidence that all our proceedings have flowed from views of justice and conciliation, and that we give them willingly that form which may best meet corresponding dispositions.

Add to this that the same motives which produced the postponement of the act till the fifteenth of November last, are in favor of its further suspension; and, as we have reason to hope that it may soon yield to arrangements of mutual consent and convenience, justice seems to require that the same measure may be dealt out to the few cases which may fall within its short course, as to all others preceding and following it. I cannot, therefore, but recommend the suspension of this act for a reasonable time, on considerations of justice, amity, and the public interests.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DEFENCE OF PORTS AND HARBORS.

Mr. MITCHILL from the committee appointed on the 5th instant to take into consideration that part of the Message of the President of the United States of December 2d, 1806 which relates to the protection of the seaports, harbors, and waters of the United States, made a report, as follows:

It appears from the communication of the Secretary at War, made to Congress on the 13th February, 1806, that several of the public works erected in different parts of the nation, for the purposes of defence, stand in need of finishing or repairs. The condition of the fortifications of Fort Sumner, in Maine, Fort Constitution, in New Hampshire, Fort Independence, in Massachusetts, Forts Adams and Wolcot in Rhode Island, Fort Trumbull, in Connecticut, Fort Jay, in New York, Fort Mifflin in Pennsylvania, Fort McHenry, in Maryland, Fort Nelson, in Virginia, Fort Johnson, in North Carolina, Forts Moultrie, Pinckney, and Johnson, in South Carolina, Fort Green, in Georgia, and of Forts St. Louis, St. Charles, and St. Philip, in Orleans, and of the various other forts and military stations, is well known to the War Department, and only requires appropriations of money from year to year, to enable the needful additions to be made.

It is therefore deemed unnecessary to enter into a detailed enumeration of their respective wants. But the committee cannot forbear to make mention of New York, Charleston, and New Orleans.

They are fully sensible of the great and growing importance of New York; its exposed situation is a subject of public and general concern. It is agreed that the national power ought to be employed in its protection. The attention of the Executive was therefore turned to that object during the summer and autumn of 1805; and upwards of $25,000 were expended in repairing and enlarging in the most substantial manner the works on Governor's Island. These are progressing with all convenient speed; and though at this moment suspended on account of the rigor of the season, the committee has had the satisfaction to learn that the labor will be resumed with the cessation of the cold, and be steadily continued until both the city and harbor shall be put into a respectable state of defence. By the fortifications which it is intended to construct upon the different favorable positions which the land affords both above and below Governor's Island, skilful engineers conceive that so much will be done as to repel every ordinary assault of ships, and of all other force less than an invading army. The intended substitution of permanent structures of solid masonry, instead of wood and sand, will indeed require more time for their completion; but an ample compensation for this will be found eventually in their greater strength and durability.

The fortifications at Charleston, South Carolina, having been almost totally ruined by the severe hurricane of 1804, measures have been already adopted to rebuild them in the best manner that the situation of the ground admits.

Preparations are also making for the protection of New Orleans, and the mouth of the Mississippi, and evince a similar attention to the public interests in that quarter.

The committee, however, has not judged it necessary to particularize the specific sums which it may be needful to apply to each of these important objects. There would be considerable difficulty in this, for want of circumstantial and minute information. They therefore believe it will be sufficient to recommend an ample appropriation in gross, for the repair of existing fortifications, and the erection of such new ones as may be required; and to leave the expenditure of the same, where the general safety or local welfare shall demand it, to the ample information and sound discretion of the Executive.

Under these considerations the committee ask leave to report a bill, making further appropriations for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States, and for building gunboats.

The bill was read and ordered to a second reading.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, additional force is necessary to the Military Establishment of the United States.

He observed that he was one of those who, in 1802, were of opinion that the present Military Establishment was sufficient for the then existing state of the nation. At that time we were at peace with the Indians; of course few men were necessary for the Western frontier, and at every point of the Atlantic shores we were prepared for resistance by the strength of our militia; that the late acquirement of territory gave us an exposed frontier, which could not be succored speedily by the militia of the Union; he therefore conceived an addition to the Army as indispensably necessary.

THURSDAY, January 15.

Mr. WORTHINGTON communicated two resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Ohio; the one, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their exertions to obtain a grant of land between the Sciota and the Little Miami, in any part of the unappropriated lands of the United States within that State, for the use of schools, within the Virginia military district, in lieu of the donation heretofore granted by Congress for that purpose, for reasons stated in the resolution; the other, requesting them to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States, or any of the territories thereof, so soon as the Constitution will admit of the same.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and ordered to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary for the Department of State, in pursuance of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks," and stating, that it is his opinion that the public service would be promoted by a provision at least sufficient for the employment of an additional clerk.

The bill, entitled "An act repealing the acts laying duties on salt, and continuing in force, for a further time, the first section of an act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. GILES, BRADLEY, and BALDWIN, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary for the Department of War, in compliance with the 5th section of the "Act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks, and to authorize the laying out certain public roads, and for other purposes;" and stating the names of the clerks employed in the Secretary's and Accountant's office, in the War Department, in the year 1806, and the sum given to each; and that the extension of our relations with the Indians has, within the two years past, made a considerable addition to the business for clerks in the said department; and the two reports last mentioned were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. TURNER, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to alter the time of holding the circuit court in the district of North Carolina, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, 1808, reported the same with sundry amendments, which the committee have incorporated with the bill. And it was agreed that the bill should be read as reported, and considered in paragraphs, as in Committee of the Whole; and, after having agreed to sundry amendments in the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th sections, the further consideration thereof was postponed.

Mr. ADAMS, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, on the 12th instant, reported a bill to reduce the expenses attending the administration of justice in the District of Columbia; and the bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, praying the protection and aid of Congress, presented on the 28th of January, 1806, with the documents accompanying the same, and the report of a committee of the Senate thereon, made the following report;

That having examined the said memorial and documents, and considered the report of the committee of the Senate, made at the last session of Congress, and finding the said report to contain a statement of the material facts relative to the subject of the said memorial, and approving of the resolution proposed by the committee, referring to the said report as a part of this report, they recommend the adoption of the resolution offered to the Senate by the former committee.

In Senate of the United States, March 21, 1806.

Mr. LOGAN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 28th January last, the memorial of the President and Directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, made report:

That it appears that a company has been incorporated and established by concurrent acts of the Legislatures of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, for the purpose of cutting a canal across the isthmus, separating the waters of the Delaware and Chesapeake bays. The capital of the company consists of two thousand six hundred shares, and two hundred dollars constitute a share. The sum of consequence contemplated to complete the work, is five hundred and twenty thousand dollars. Of this sum nearly four hundred thousand dollars have been subscribed by individuals, and between five and six hundred shares remain unsubscribed for.

The site of the canal has been fixed, and its embouchures established at Welch Point, on the Elk river, and Mendenhall's ferry, on Christiana Creek. It is intended to furnish a navigation to vessels drawing upwards of seven feet water. The work has been commenced, and a canal to supply the necessary water to the main canal has been opened from the headwaters of the Elk river, nearly to the line of the route of the grand canal. This canal of supply communicates with populous and productive tracts of country in the three States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, and is calculated for barge navigation.

The length of the main canal, as the route has been established, is twenty-one miles, and the expense of cutting it is estimated at twenty-five thousand dollars a mile.

The committee are of opinion that the work designed to be accomplished by the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company is one of great interest and importance, not only to the three States, whose laws have incorporated the company, but generally to the United States. By opening the proposed communication between the two bays, the safe inland navigation of twenty-one miles, supplies the place of a circuitous and exposed navigation of five hundred. The large tracts of country in Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, connected with the waters of the bays, will be furnished with a safe water communication, and will immediately feel the great benefit of the work. In the event of a war, the facility, celerity, safety, and cheapness, in the transportation of troops, and ordnance, and military stores, from remote parts of the United States, present an object at once of sufficient magnitude to interest the General Government in the undertaking. The importance, however, of the proposed canal, though great in itself, is not justly appreciated by considering it as a separate work; it must be viewed as the basis of a vast scheme of interior navigation, connecting the waters of the lakes with those of the most southern States, a plan certainly within the compass of industry and art; and if beyond the present means, unquestionably within the growing resources of the country.

The following statement and illustration of the plan, the committee have extracted from the memorial, furnishing a correct view of the subject, well deserving the serious consideration of the Senate:

"It is easy however to see, by examining any map of the United States, that this extent may be carried much further. To the southward, the canal through the Dismal Swamp, now in execution, will open the communication to the waters of Albemarle sound, and from thence through the inlets to South Carolina and Georgia. To the northward, a communication is now nearly opened from Albany, up the Mohawk river to Lake Ontario and all the upper lakes; if a similar one be made from the Hudson river to Lake Champlain, it will extend the navigation to Quebec. And to the eastward, if the pass from Buzzard's to Boston bay be opened, which has been contemplated, it will in like manner extend it to Boston and all the coast of Massachusetts. Thus, with opening only a few short passes, of which the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal is the great and preliminary one, a communication may be made nearly free from all the dangers of the ocean, along the whole coast of the United States."

The committee are of opinion that it is among the first duties of a Government to promote public improvements of a general nature: No works deserve the character of public improvements more than canals.

The one proposed by the memorialists is of the first magnitude; it therefore well deserves the assistance and encouragement of the Government. Considering that a large capital has been subscribed, that an expensive part of the work is nearly completed, that probably, without the countenance and aid of the Government, the work will cease, to the loss of a number of public spirited individuals, and the destruction of a great public improvement; it is the opinion of the committee that aid ought to be granted to the memorialists.

If it be inconvenient, at this moment, to spare money from the Treasury, the United States have it in their power to contribute the assistance prayed for by a grant of land. The grant may be either gratuitous, or the company enjoined to dispose of it, and to credit the United States with shares of their stock, equal to the proceeds of the land, at the established rate of two hundred dollars for each share.

The committeee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That —— acres of land be granted to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, upon their giving bond, conditioned to transfer to the United States a number of the shares of the capital stock of said company, at the rate of two hundred dollars a share, equal to the proceeds of the sales of the land granted to them; and conditioned to sell the said land within —— years, and to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury a true account of the sales.

The report was ordered to lie for consideration.

BURR'S CONSPIRACY.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Agreeably to the request of the House of Representatives, communicated in their resolution of the 16th instant, I proceed to state, under the reserve therein expressed, information received touching an illegal combination of private individuals against the peace and safety of the Union, and a military expedition planned by them against the territories of a Power in amity with the United States, with the measures I have pursued for suppressing the same.

I had for some time been in the constant expectation of receiving such further information as would have enabled me to lay before the Legislature the termination as well as the beginning and progress of this scene of depravity, so far as it has been acted on the Ohio and its waters. From this, the state of safety of the lower country might have been estimated on probable grounds; and the delay was indulged the rather, because no circumstance had yet made it necessary to call in the aid of the legislative functions. Information, now recently communicated, has brought us nearly to the period contemplated. The mass of what I have received in the course of these transactions, is voluminous; but little has been given under the sanction of an oath, so as to constitute formal and legal evidence. It is chiefly in the form of letters, often containing such a mixture of rumors, conjectures, and suspicions, as renders it difficult to sift out the real facts, and unadvisable to hazard more than general outlines, strengthened by current information, on the particular credibility of the relator. In this state of the evidence, delivered sometimes too under the restriction of private confidence, neither safety nor justice will permit the exposing names, except that of the principal actor, whose guilt is placed beyond question.

Some time in the latter part of September, I received intimations that designs were in agitation in the western country unlawful and unfriendly to the peace of the Union; and that the prime mover in these was AARON BURR, heretofore distinguished by the favor of his country. The grounds of these intimations being inconclusive, the objects uncertain, and the fidelity of that country, known to be firm, the only measure taken was to urge the informants to use their best endeavors to get further insight into the designs and proceedings of the suspected persons, and to communicate them to me.

It was not till the latter part of October, that the objects of the conspiracy began to be perceived; but still so blended and involved in mystery, that nothing distinct could be singled out for pursuit. In this state of uncertainty, as to the crime contemplated, the acts done, and the legal course to be pursued, I thought it best to send to the scene, where these things were principally in transaction, a person in whose integrity, understanding, and discretion, entire confidence could be reposed, with instructions to investigate the plots going on, to enter into conference (for which he had sufficient credentials) with the Governors and all other officers, civil and military, and, with their aid, to do on the spot whatever should be necessary to discover the designs of the conspirators, arrest their means, bring their persons to punishment, and to call out the force of the country to suppress any unlawful enterprise in which it should be found they were engaged. By this time it was known that many boats were under preparation, stores of provisions collecting, and an unusual number of suspicious characters in motion on the Ohio and its waters. Besides despatching the confidential agent to that quarter, orders were at the same time sent to the Governors of the Orleans and Mississippi Territories, and to the commanders of the land and naval forces there, to be on their guard against surprise, and in constant readiness to resist any enterprise which might be attempted on the vessels, posts, or other objects, under their care; and on the 8th of November instructions were forwarded to General Wilkinson, to hasten an accommodation with the Spanish commandant on the Sabine, and as soon as that was effected, to fall back with his principal force to the hither bank of the Mississippi, for the defence of the interesting points on that river. By a letter received from that officer on the 25th of November, but dated October 21st, we learnt that a confidential agent of Aaron Burr had been deputed to him with communications, partly written in cypher and partly oral, explaining his designs, exaggerating his resources, and making such offers of emolument and command, to engage him and the army in his unlawful enterprise as he had flattered himself would be successful. The General, with the honor of a soldier and fidelity of a good citizen, immediately despatched a trusty officer to me, with information of what had passed, proceeding to establish such an understanding with the Spanish commandant on the Sabine, as permitted him to withdraw his force across the Mississippi, and to enter on measures for opposing the projected enterprise.

The General's letter, which came to hand on the 25th of November, as has been mentioned, and some other information received a few days earlier, when brought together, developed Burr's general designs, different parts of which only had been revealed to different informants. It appeared that he contemplated two distinct objects, which might be carried on either jointly or separately, and either the one or the other first, as circumstances should direct. One of these was the severance of the Union of these States by the Alleghany mountains; the other, an attack on Mexico. A third object was provided, merely ostensible, to wit: the settlement of a pretended purchase of a tract of country on the Washita, claimed by a Baron Bastrop. This was to serve as the pretext for all his preparations, an allurement for such followers as really wished to acquire settlements in that country, and a cover under which to retreat in the event of a final discomfiture of both branches of his real design.

He found at once that the attachment of the western country to the present Union was not to be shaken; that its dissolution could not be effected with the consent of its inhabitants, and that his resources were inadequate, as yet, to effect it by force. He took his course then at once, determined to seize on New Orleans, plunder the bank there, possess himself of the military and naval stores, and proceed on his expedition to Mexico, and to this object all his means and preparations were now directed. He collected from all the quarters where himself or his agents possessed influence, all the ardent, restless, desperate, and disaffected persons, who were ready for any enterprise analogous to their characters. He seduced good and well meaning citizens, some by assurances that he possessed the confidence of the Government, and was acting under its secret patronage, a pretence which procured some credit from the state of our differences with Spain; and others, by offers of land in Bastrop's claim on the Washita.

This was the state of my information of his proceedings about the last of November, at which time, therefore, it was first possible to take specific measures to meet them. The proclamation of November 27th, two days after the receipt of General Wilkinson's information, was now issued. Orders were despatched to every interesting point on the Ohio and Mississippi, from Pittsburgh to New Orleans, for the employment of such force, either of the regulars or of the millitia, and of such proceedings also of the civil authorities, as might enable them to seize on all the boats and stores provided for the enterprise, to arrest the persons concerned, and to suppress, effectually, the further progress of the enterprise. A little before the receipt of these orders in the State of Ohio, our confidential agent, who had been diligently employed in investigating the conspiracy, had acquired sufficient information to open himself to the Governor of that State, and apply for the immediate exertion of the authority and power of the State to crush the combination. Governor Tiffin and the Legislature, with a promptitude, an energy, and patriotic zeal, which entitle them to a distinguished place in the affection of their sister States, effected the seizure of all the boats, provisions, and other preparations within their reach, and thus gave a first blow, materially disabling the enterprise in its outset.

In Kentucky a premature attempt to bring Burr to justice, without a sufficient evidence for his conviction, had produced a popular impression in his favor, and a general disbelief of his guilt. This gave him an unfortunate opportunity of hastening his equipments. The arrival of the proclamation and orders, and the application and information of our confidential agent, at length awakened the authorities of that State to the truth, and then produced the same promptitude and energy of which the neighboring State had set the example. Under an act of their Legislature, of December 23d, militia was instantly ordered to different important points, and measures taken for doing whatever could yet be done. Some boats (accounts vary from five to double or treble that number,) and persons (differently estimated from one to three hundred,) had in the mean time passed the Falls of Ohio, to rendezvous at the mouth of Cumberland, with others expected down that river.

Not apprized, till very late, that any boats were building on Cumberland, the effect of the proclamation had been trusted to for some time in the State of Tennessee. But, on the 19th of December, similar communications and instructions, with those to the neighboring States, were despatched by express to the Governor, and a general officer of the western division of the State; and, on the 23d of December, our confidential agent left Frankfort for Nashville, to put into activity the means of that State also. But by information received yesterday, I learn that on the 23d of December, Mr. Burr descended the Cumberland with two boats merely of accommodation, carrying with him from that State no quota towards his unlawful enterprise. Whether, after the arrival of the proclamation, of the orders, or of our agent, any exertion which could be made by that State, or the orders of the Governor of Kentucky for calling out the militia at the mouth of Cumberland, would be in time to arrest these boats, and those from the Falls of Ohio, is still doubtful.

On the whole, the fugitives from the Ohio, with their associates from Cumberland, or any other place in that quarter, cannot threaten serious danger to the city of New Orleans.

By the same express of December nineteenth, orders were sent to the Governors of Orleans and Mississippi, supplementary to those which had been given on the twenty-fifth of November, to hold the militia of their Territories in readiness to co-operate, for their defence, with the regular troops and armed vessels then under command of General Wilkinson. Great alarm, indeed, was excited at New Orleans by the exaggerated accounts of Mr. Burr, disseminated through his emissaries, of the armies and navies he was to assemble there. General Wilkinson had arrived there himself on the 24th of November, and had immediately put into activity the resources of the place, for the purpose of its defence; and on the 10th of December, he was joined by his troops from the Sabine. Great zeal was shown by the inhabitants generally; the merchants of the place readily agreeing to the most laudable exertions and sacrifices for manning the armed vessels with their seamen; and the other citizens manifesting unequivocal fidelity to the Union, and a spirit of determined resistance to their expected assailants.

Surmises have been hazarded that this enterprise is to receive aid from certain foreign Powers. But these surmises are without proof or probability. The wisdom of the measures sanctioned by Congress at its last session, has placed us in the paths of peace and justice with the only Powers with whom we had any differences; and nothing has happened since which makes it either their interest or ours to pursue another course. No change of measures has taken place on our part:

none ought to take place at this time. With the one, friendly arrangement was then proposed, and the law, deemed necessary on the failure of that, was suspended to give time for a fair trial of the issue. With the same Power friendly arrangement is now proceeding, under good expectations, and the same law deemed necessary on failure of that, is still suspended, to give time for a fair trial of the issue. With the other, negotiation was in like manner then preferred, and provisional measures only taken to meet the event of rupture. With the same Power negotiation is still preferred, and provisional measures only are necessary to meet the event of rupture. While, therefore, we do not deflect in the slightest degree from the course we then assumed, and are still pursuing, with mutual consent, to restore a good understanding, we are not to impute to them practices as irreconcileable to interest as to good faith, and changing necessarily the relations of peace and justice between us to those of war. These surmises are, therefore, to be imputed to the vauntings of the author of this enterprise, to multiply his partisans by magnifying the belief of his prospects and support.

By letters from General Wilkinson, of the 14th and 18th of December, which came to hand two days after the date of the resolution of the House of Representatives, that is to say, on the morning of the 18th instant, I received the important affidavit, a copy of which I now communicate, with extracts of so much of the letters as comes within the scope of the resolution. By these it will be seen that of three of the principal emissaries of Mr. Burr, whom the General had caused to be apprehended, one had been liberated by habeas corpus, and two others, being those particularly employed in the endeavor to corrupt the General and Army of the United States, have been embarked by him for ports in the Atlantic States, probably on the consideration that an impartial trial could not be expected, during the present agitation of New Orleans, and that that city was not as yet a safe place of confinement. As soon as these persons shall arrive, they will be delivered to the custody of the law, and left to such course of trial, both as to place and progress, as its functionaries may direct. The presence of the highest judicial authorities, to be assembled at this place within a few days, the means of pursuing a sounder course of proceedings here than elsewhere, and the aid of the Executive means, should the Judges have occasion to use them, render it equally desirable for the criminals as for the public, that, being already removed from the place where they were first apprehended, the first regular arrest should take place here, and the course of proceedings receive here their proper direction.

JANUARY 22, 1807. TH. JEFFERSON.

Ordered, That the Message, and documents therein referred to, lie for consideration; and that five hundred copies thereof be printed for the use of the Senate.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

By the letter of Captain Bissell, who commands at Fort Massac, and of Mr. Murrell to General Jackson, of Tennessee, copies of which are now communicated to Congress, it will be seen that Aaron Burr passed Fort Massac on the 31st December, with about ten boats, navigated by about six hands each, without any military appearance; and that three boats with ammunition were said to have been arrested by the militia at Louisville.

As the guard of militia posted on various points of the Ohio will be able to prevent any further aids passing through that channel, should any be attempted, we may now estimate with tolerable certainty the means derived from the Ohio and its waters, towards the accomplishment of the purposes of Mr. Burr.

The progress which they made in the execution of the work during the last season, will appear in their report now communicated to Congress. On the receipt of it, I took measures to obtain consent for making the road of the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, through which the Commissioners proposed to lay it out. I have received acts of the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, giving the consent desired; that of Pennsylvania has the subject still under consideration, as is supposed. Until I receive full consent to a free choice of route through the whole distance, I have thought it safest neither to accept or reject finally the partial report of the Commissioners. CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

The Senate took into consideration the report of the committee on the memorial of the President and Directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company. The resolution reported by the committee is as follows:

Resolved, That —— acres of land be granted to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, upon their giving bond, conditioned to transfer to the United States a number of shares of the capital stock of said company, at the rate of two hundred dollars a share, equal to the proceeds of the sales of the land granted to them; and conditioned to sell the said land within —— years, and to furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury a true account of the sales.

Mr. BAYARD.—Mr. President, I am apprehensive that the resolution now under consideration, not being viewed as a national object, will not be regarded with the attention it deserves. Having some acquaintance with the subject, and being strongly impressed with its importance, I deem it a duty to communicate to the Senate the facts which I possess, and to unfold those views of the object proposed, which have presented themselves to my mind. I shall not feel it incumbent on me to employ any argument to prove the general utility of canals. If, however, there be but one opinion on this subject in old and populous countries, how much more benefit may we expect from the improvement in a young country where labor and capital, which it is calculated to save, are so much more wanted.

The relative position of the Delaware and Chesapeake bays long since awakened the attention of a distinguished body, as to the practicability of opening a water communication between them.

In the year 1769, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Rittenhouse, Mr. Gilpin, and Mr. Hollingsworth, were appointed a committee by the Philosophical Society of Philadelphia, to examine the ground between the bays, and to ascertain the practicability and probable expense of opening a communication between their waters. Their report strongly recommended the project, as one not only susceptible of being accomplished, but as a work eventually promising an adequate profit. The want of capital at that time, the disturbances then arising with Great Britain, the occurrence and consequences of the war, diverted, for a long time, the public attention from this interesting object. When, however, peace and a flourishing commerce had recruited the exhausted resources of the country, it again occupied the minds of those men, whose views, extending beyond themselves, are employed upon objects of general benefit and utility.

A rival interest had long been felt by Pennsylvania and Maryland, as to the waters of the Susquehannah. The Susquehannah, and the streams falling into it rendered navigable, it was evident that a great proportion of the produce of Pennsylvania and a part of that of the State of New York would pass down the river, and seek a market at Baltimore.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania having this impression, enacted penal laws against removing obstructions to the navigation of the river. The expected advantage had rendered Maryland unwilling to consent to unite, at their heads, the waters of the two bays. This unworthy spirit, which opposed a partial interest to general benefit, yielded at length to the enlarged and liberal views which comprehend the whole interests of the two States. Pennsylvania agreed to allow the navigation of the Susquehannah to be opened, and Maryland to permit the heads of the bays to be united by a canal.

In the years 1799, 1801, and 1802, by Legislative acts of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, a company was incorporated with a capital of $500,000, for the purpose of cutting the canal. Subscriptions were obtained nearly to the amount of $400,000, the company was organized and the work undertaken.

Engineers of ability were employed to survey and level the ground upon several routes, which different opinions had distinguished as preferable, and after a full knowledge on the subject was attained, the line of the canal was fixed by the Board of Directors from Welch Point, on the Elk, to a point near Mendenhall's Landing, on the Christiana river. The extent of this route is twenty-one miles. A shorter distance might have united the two bays, but the safety of the harbors and navigation, and the boldness of the waters, secured by the route adopted, not only justified, but strongly recommended, the extension of the line and the probable increase of expense. An opinion had existed that the bays might be united so as to allow the waters of the one to flow into the other. The scheme was considered, but it was found that it could not be executed, so as to answer the intended purpose, without an expense infinitely beyond the means of the company. A canal with locks was, in consequence, determined on. The depth of the canal was fixed at seven and a half feet, to afford navigation to the common vessels belonging to the bays. To supply the locks of the canal, the sources of the Elk river were purchased and conveyed to the main by a smaller canal. This canal of supply, proceeding from near the line of Pennsylvania, and furnishing a barge navigation, is nearly completed; the length of it is about five miles.

In making surveys, in the purchase of water-rights and lands, of boats, and materials, in payment of laborers, and incidental expenses, the company has expended upwards of $100,000. The magnitude of the work, and its numerous details of expense, were not distinctly perceived at the time it was commenced. When it was found that one-fourth of the capital of the company was exhausted, and the work which alone had been originally contemplated not commenced, a general despondency pervaded the subscribers to the project, and many despairing of the completion of the work, and considering the payment of their subscriptions as a direct sacrifice of their property, refused to pay their instalments, and have put the company to the expense, and subjected them to the delay, of law-suits. In consequence, their operations have been paralyzed, and the work suspended.

Under these circumstances, which I felt myself bound to unfold to the view of the Senate, it is, that the company now comes to ask the assistance and support of the General Government.

This, sir, I acknowledge they have no right to expect, unless the aid we contribute belongs to the interest of the public. I shall, therefore, confine my inquiries to the advantages which different States, and the Union at large, will derive from the scheme. Virginia, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, have an immediate interest in the canal. It opens an inland communication between them all. The waters emptying into the Chesapeake penetrate immense tracts of country. The towns and landings on these waters have new markets opened to them, and the assistance of additional capitals.

An interior navigation of twenty-one miles, exempt from risk, saves a voyage of five hundred, exposed to the danger of enemies and the common perils of the sea. The cheapness, facility, and safety of the intercourse must necessarily quicken the commerce between the Northern and Eastern and Southern States. The manufactures of the North will be exchanged through this channel for the produce of the South. I will not trespass so far as to go through details upon this head. I will mention, however, one article connecting the interest of Virginia with the scheme. That State abounds with coal. The consumption of this article in many towns is already considerable, and must increase with the population and manufactures of the country. At present English coal is sold as cheap in Philadelphia, as the coal of Virginia; the canal would bring the Virginia coal to market at a price which would soon exclude the English. The capital of Philadelphia enables that city to import cheaper than Baltimore; and the rate of its market attracts the custom of a great portion of the western country. Great quantities of merchandise are carried from Philadelphia, passing Baltimore, to the west and south. I shall be justified in saying that the chief market of the western country will be brought sixty or seventy miles nearer to them. To them, therefore, this channel is an object of considerable interest.

In a national point of view the canal propsses the greatest advantages in the event of war.

Without the aid of England a war with any principal Power of Europe would suspend, if not destroy, our external navigation. To possess then interior navigation, uniting distant parts with the centre of the country, would be an advantage of incalculable value. And I would beg the Senate particularly to consider the important service the execution of the scheme would render; the military operations, in facilitating the transportation of troops, baggage, stores, and ordnance, to and from distant parts of the country. The movements of an enemy possessing the sea, exposed to more hazards, could not be made from certain points with more celerity and ease than those of our own army. But, sir, however great the importance of this canal may be considered even by itself, yet the nation ought to view it, and its just consequence is only seen when regarded as a principal link in a great chain of interior navigation extending from the northern to the southern extremities of the country.

A canal is contemplated from the Delaware to the Raritan. This will open a communication between the Delaware, the North river, and the Sound. A communication is nearly effected between the Mohawk river and Lake Ontario. A similar one is practicable between the Hudson and Lake George, which would extend the navigation to Quebeck. To the eastward the connexion of Buzzard's and Boston bay, carries the navigation to Boston. To the south a canal from Elizabeth river, through the Dismal Swamp to Pasquotank river, extends the navigation to Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds; and a connexion of the inlets, which is represented as practicable and likely to be undertaken, carries it to Georgia. Thus we see an unbroken chain of interior navigation can be formed, binding together all the Atlantic States, securing in time of war and facilitating in time of peace, the internal trade of the country.

This extensive work is not only practicable, but I consider there is no hazard in affirming that before the lapse of many years it will be accomplished. The extensive and powerful private and public interest which depends upon it will not suffer the object to be neglected. The waters of no country of the same extent offer so easy and complete a communication as those of the United States.

I have not enumerated all the points of connexion. I have stated only those more immediately relating to the subject of our consideration.

There is reason to believe that the subject of internal navigation has not escaped the attention of the Administration. The present moment is propitious for the undertaking. Your Treasury is full, and the redeemable part of the public debt cannot absorb the whole of your revenue. In the other House a committee has been appointed to dispose of the surplus. I have, however, to lament that doubts of the highest authority exist as to the Constitutional right of this Government to apply the public money to objects of this kind. Though the plan I mean to propose to the Senate is not exposed to this objection, yet I shall beg permission very briefly to consider it.

It is admitted that the Constitution does not expressly give the power to cut canals; but we possess and are in daily exercise of the power to provide for the protection and safety of commerce, and the defence of the nation. It has never been contended that no power exists which has not been expressly delegated.

There is no express power given to erect a fort or magazine, though it is recognised in the delegation of exclusive legislative powers in certain cases. The power to erect light-houses and piers, to survey and take the soundings on the coast, or erect public buildings, is neither expressly given nor recognised in the Constitution, but it is embraced by a liberal and just interpretation of the clause in the Constitution, which legitimates all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers expressly delegated. On a like principle the bank of the United States was incorporated. Having a power to provide for the safety of commerce and the defence of the nation, we may fairly infer a power to cut a canal, a measure unquestionably proper with a view to either object.

But, sir, the plan I mean to propose is entirely clear of the Constitutional objection. Without any such objection I should despair of obtaining a grant of money for such an object. While money cannot be had to fortify our seaports, I cannot expect it to dig canals. I am going to ask for land upon principles of reciprocal benefit to the company and to the Government. We have, sir, 300 millions of acres, which I may say with certainty cannot be sold in a century. I will not inquire whether we have an estate in them for a hundred years. It is our policy to sell them as soon as possible. The resolution before us proposes to sell land to the company, and to receive payment in their stock.

There can be no question as to our right to sell the land for their stock. We have given it for the endowment of schools, for the making of roads, and have made gratuitous grants; and surely we must have the right to sell it for canal stock. Complete the canal and the stock cannot fail to be valuable. The United States may then convert it into money. I am warranted in saying that a grant to this company will not interfere with the sales of land made by the public. I believe that gentlemen can be found to purchase the land, with a view to promote the object of the grant, who would not purchase of the public. It is the interest of the United States, which I am proposing, more than that of the company. I am asking land, which you could not sell in a hundred years, and land which it is not likely you will hold half the period of time. A few years might complete the canal, and give to the stock its value. You will then have anticipated the sale of so much land, and accomplished an object of great public and private utility.

I have reason to believe, if this Government grant assistance to the company, the example will be followed by the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland. It now depends upon us, whether this great work shall languish and sink, or be revived and completed. More than a hundred thousand dollars have been expended; if the work be forsaken this money is lost. The project, now abandoned, will never again be undertaken by individuals. They now propose to assist you with a large capital—reject the offer, and hereafter you will be forced to do the work at your sole expense. Never had we it in our power upon terms so cheap to accomplish an object of great public importance. You save a capital of more than $100,000; you unite by internal communication the waters of five States; you lay the foundation of a scheme of interior navigation connecting the extremities of the continent; and you support a spirit of improvement so essential to the prosperity of the country, by an accommodation which takes not a cent out of our Treasury, and which promises at least a reciprocal benefit to the Government.

Mr. PICKERING supported the resolution; Mr. ADAMS opposed it; Messrs. GILES and BALDWIN suggested doubts about it. The resolution was agreed to—yeas 20, nays 6, and Messrs. BAYARD, GILES, and CLAY, were appointed a committee to bring in a bill accordingly.

GUNBOATS.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the request of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of the fifth instant, I proceed to give such information as is possessed, of the effect of gunboats, in the protection and defence of harbors, of the numbers thought necessary, and of the proposed distribution of them among the ports and harbors of the United States.

Under present circumstances, and governed by the intentions of the Legislature, as manifested by their annual appropriations of money for the purposes of defence, it has been concluded to combine—1st, land batteries, furnished with heavy cannon and mortars, and established on all the points around the place favorable for preventing vessels from lying before it; 2d, moveable artillery, which may be carried, as occasion may require, to points unprovided with fixed batteries; 3d, floating batteries; and, 4th, gunboats, which may oppose an enemy at his entrance, and co-operate with the batteries for his expulsion.

On this subject, professional men were consulted as far as we had opportunity. General Wilkinson, and the late General Gates, gave their opinions, in writing, in favor of the system, as will be seen by their letters now communicated. The higher officers of the Navy gave the same opinions, in separate conferences, as their presence at the Seat of Government offered occasions of consulting them, and no difference of judgment appeared on the subject. Those of Commodore Barron and Captain Tingey, now here, are recently furnished in writing, and transmitted herewith to the Legislature.

The efficacy of gunboats for the defence of harbors, and of other smooth and enclosed waters, may be estimated, in part, from that of galleys, formerly much used, but less powerful, more costly in their construction and maintenance, and requiring more men. But the gunboat itself is believed to be in use with every modern maritime nation for the purposes of defence. In the Mediterranean, on which are several small Powers, whose system, like ours, is peace and defence, few harbors are without this article of protection. Our own experience there of the effect of gunboats for harbor service, is recent. Algiers is particularly known to have owed to a great provision of these vessels for the safety of its city, since the epoch of their construction. Before that, it had been repeatedly insulted and injured. The effect of gunboats, at present, in the neighborhood of Gibraltar, is well known, and how much they were used, both in the attack and defence of that place, during a former war. The extensive resort to them by the two greatest naval Powers in the world, on an enterprise of invasion not long since in prospect, shows their confidence in their efficacy for the purposes for which they are suited. By the Northern Powers of Europe, whose seas are particularly adapted to them, they are still more used. The remarkable action between the Russian flotilla of gunboats and galleys, and a Turkish fleet of ships-of-the-line and frigates, in the Liman sea, in one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, will be readily recollected. The latter, commanded by their most celebrated admiral, were completely defeated, and several of their ships-of-the-line destroyed.

From the opinions given as to the number of gunboats necessary for some of the principal seaports, and from a view of all the towns and ports, from Orleans to Maine inclusive, entitled to protection in proportion to their situation and circumstances, it is concluded that, to give them a due measure of protection in times of war, about two hundred gunboats will be requisite. According to the first ideas, the following would be their general distribution, liable to be varied on more mature examination, and as circumstances shall vary, that is to say:

To the Mississippi and its neighboring waters, forty gunboats;

To Savannah and Charleston, and the harbors on each side, from St. Mary's to Currituck, twenty-five;

To the Chesapeake and its waters, twenty;

To Delaware bay and river, fifteen;

To New York, the Sound, and waters as far as Cape Cod, fifty;

To Boston, and the harbors north of Cape Cod, fifty.

The flotillas assigned to these several stations, might each be under the care of a particular commandant, and the vessels composing them, would, in ordinary, be distributed among the harbors within the station, in proportion to their importance.

Of these boats, a proper proportion would be of the larger size, such as those heretofore built, capable of navigating any seas, and of reinforcing, occasionally, the strength of even the most distant port, when menaced with danger. The residue would be confined to their own or the neighboring harbors, would be smaller, less furnished for accommodation, and consequently less costly. Of the number supposed necessary, seventy-three are built or building, and the hundred twenty-seven still to be provided, would cost from five to six thousand dollars. Having regard to the convenience of the Treasury, as well as to the resources for building, it has been thought that the one-half of these might be built in the present year, and the other half the next. With the Legislature, however, it will rest to stop where we are, or at any further point, when they shall be of opinion that the number provided shall be sufficient for the object.

At times, when Europe, as well as the United States, shall be at peace, it would not be proposed that more than six or eight of these vessels should be kept afloat. When Europe is in war, treble that number might be necessary, to be distributed among those particular harbors which foreign vessels of war are in the habit of frequenting, for the purpose of preserving order therein. But they would be manned in ordinary, with only their complement for navigation, relying on the seamen and militia of the port if called into action on any sudden emergency. It would be only when the United States should themselves be at war, that the whole number would be brought into actual service, and would be ready, in the first moments of the war, to co-operate with the other means for covering at once the line of our seaports. At all times, those unemployed would be withdrawn into places not exposed to sudden enterprise, hauled up under sheds from the sun and weather, and kept in preservation with little expense for repairs or maintenance.

It must be superfluous to observe, that this species of naval armament is proposed merely for defensive operation; that it can have but little effect towards protecting our commerce in the open seas, even on our own coast; and still less can it become an excitement to engage in offensive maritime war, towards which it would furnish no means.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The Message was read, and, with the papers, ordered to lie for consideration.

Ordered, That the memorial of sundry merchants of the city of Philadelphia, presented on the 29th of January last, on the subject of drawbacks, be referred to Messrs. LOGAN, BRADLEY, and ADAMS, with leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LOGAN observed, that he had for some time viewed with anxiety the continued depredations committed on the commerce of the United States by the belligerent Powers of Europe, by which our mercantile capital had suffered a loss of millions, and our national character was degraded. He considered this lamentable situation of our commerce to arise from the bounty, in the form of drawback, given by Government to encourage the carrying trade, by which our merchants were led into unnecessary conflicts with foreign nations. He therefore submitted the following motion; which was read and ordered to lie for consideration:

"That a committee be appointed to consider the propriety of repealing so much of any act as allows a drawback of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported out of the United States, and that such committee be instructed to report by bill or otherwise."

The Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday for the appointment of a committee "to inquire into the expediency of allowing incorporated banks and insurance companies to take and sell ships and vessels without forfeiting the benefit of their registers, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise;" and the motion was adopted; and Messrs. BAYARD, BRADLEY, and SMITH of Maryland, appointed the committee.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill in addition to the act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States, reported it without amendment, and the bill was considered and postponed.

The Senate took into consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding 30,000 men," together with the report of the special committee thereon; and the President having reported the bill to the House without amendment, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until tomorrow.

On motion, it was agreed, that the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act repealing the acts laying duties on salt, and continuing in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers,'" be the order of the day for Monday next.

The bill to regulate the summoning of grand jurors was read the third time, and passed.

FRIDAY, February 13.

Mr. ADAMS, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act further supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act concerning the District of Columbia,'" reported it without amendment. On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, it was agreed, that the further consideration of the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, be postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding 30,000 men;" and, on the question, Shall this bill be read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, February 17.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee appointed on the 17th December last, "to inquire what further proceeding is necessary to carry into effect the provisions of an act, entitled 'An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," made report; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the honorable Mr. STONE, resigning his seat in the Senate; which was read.

Mr. LOGAN presented the memorial of Kinsey Johns and others, in behalf of the President and Directors of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, praying the aid of Congress in the prosecution of that undertaking, and referring to their former memorial on this subject; and the memorial was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

They have passed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act establishing circuit courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts in the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The four bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and ordered to the second reading.

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

The Senate again resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the second reading of the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended—

Mr. WHITE addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I had hoped this question would have been decided last evening, and the discussion closed in that stage of it. I am sure the Senate must be fatigued with the subject; it is therefore with extreme reluctance that I rise at this late period of the debate to reply to the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts before me, (Mr. ADAMS,) who has just sat down, especially after the field of argument has been so attentively and closely gleaned by my colleague. The gentleman was pleased to commence by charging us with precipitating this measure through the Senate. But is this the fact, sir? On the contrary, it was before Congress during the greater part of the last session; a very detailed and lucid memorial accompanied by numerous documents was then presented in relation to it; upon which a committee of this House, after full investigation, reported a resolution favorable to the measure, supported by their reasons, and a strong statement of facts. These documents were all printed and laid upon the table of every gentleman, and then it will be remembered that in order to give further time for consideration, so as to avoid the very cause of complaint now made, the friends of the project themselves moved its postponement to the present session. A second memorial from the Managers has been received this session on the same subject, followed by a second favorable report from another committee of the Senate; the printed bill itself, now under consideration, has been before us near four weeks, and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts, with all these facts staring him in the face, talks of our precipitating this measure. I may safely trust the force and correctness of this argument to the recollection of the Senate alone. But the gentleman has referred us to a similar project before the Senate for a canal at the Falls of Ohio, and tells us that three States are immediately interested in that, three likewise in this, and that consequently twelve members on this floor feel the same particular influence. The gentleman certainly did not mean to intimate that any private understanding had taken place among the supporters of these respective measures, in relation to them, or that they were capable of any such conduct. That gentlemen from different States should be found supporting similar measures of public utility, is not surely wonderful; and although the States they particularly represent may happen to be most immediately interested in their success, yet no man of honor himself, could on this account suspect them of improper motives, or attribute their coincidence of opinion to any other cause than the honest, unbiassed convictions of their own minds, and a view to the public good. The extreme case stated by the gentleman, of the nine States that have now a majority in Congress, combining to divide the public lands, and public treasures among them, could probably never have suggested itself to the mind of any member. Sir, if the oaths and political responsibility imposed by the Constitution were not sufficient the integrity, the virtue, and the honor of the Representatives of the nation, should forever preclude, even the idea of such a possibility. If you suppose all men treacherous and corrupt, what barriers, I ask, can you oppose to them, that they may not trample under foot? Such arguments are calculated only to sap and destroy that faith and confidence among men, so essential in all the relative situations of life; to inspire universal distrust and jealousy, and to sever the strongest bonds of political and civil society. We are willing, sir, that the measure we now propose, let it stand or fall, should be judged by its own merits. Every gentleman, who will cast his eye over our map, must see, more distinctly than argument can illustrate, the magnitude and importance of the project, and a moment's attention to the plan will be sufficient to convince them of the heavy expense necessarily attendant upon such an undertaking.

The canal is contemplated to be of depth and capacity sufficient for the navigation of vessels suitably constructed, of from 70 to 100 tons burden and more, so as to afford a safe and expeditious inland water transportation to all of what now composes the coasting trade between Philadelphia and Baltimore, free from the danger and expense of a circuitous and coastwise voyage of more than 300 miles. To the whole extent of fertile and populous country upon the Chesapeake and the Delaware, and their tributary streams, including part of North Carolina, the States of Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, it will give a choice of the markets of these two great rival cities, by rendering them each easily accessible to the commerce of either bay; which must unavoidably excite a competition between them infinitely desirable, especially to the agricultural interest: for to those who have any acquaintance with the business of these two places, must be well known the immense and unaccountable difference frequently experienced in their respective markets between the prices of the same articles of produce at the same time. And another grievance, more particularly complained of by those upon the waters of the Chesapeake, is the frequent, the sudden, and arbitrary fluctuations of the Baltimore market; to which the farmer is obliged to submit for want of an alternative, and which probably the opportunity of a choice alone might be sufficient to correct. The chief operation, as it appears to me, that the canal could have upon Baltimore, would be to keep her up to the standard of the Philadelphia market, and it would have the further effect of keeping them both up to the standard justified by the market abroad. All the heavy produce of the immense and fertile country watered by the Susquehannah, that must otherwise remain almost exclusively at the command of Baltimore, and nearly upon her own terms, over a canal might find a cheap and safe water transportation to Philadelphia. The very boats that now descend that river from the Painted Post, in the State of New York, more than three hundred miles up, with the produce of the country, could unlade their cargoes at the wharves of Philadelphia, because they would leave the Chesapeake, and enter the Delaware at points safely navigable at all times for such craft. It forms however, sir, no part of this plan to force this commerce, as has been intimated, to Philadelphia, or by any unfair means to divert it from Baltimore, or in any manner to injure Baltimore; but merely to give to those people an opportunity of choosing for themselves, between these two markets, the one most convenient and profitable to them. And in this aspect it is to be observed, that the present question turns not between Baltimore and Philadelphia, but between Baltimore and the whole extent of country upon the Susquehannah and other waters of the Chesapeake; whether that country shall be confined exclusively to the market of Baltimore, or have an opportunity of choosing between that and Philadelphia. And admitting, Mr. President, that the canal was now completed, yet the situation of Baltimore being still more convenient to this produce than that of Philadelphia, she might still command it with the same prices current, and this is what those who resort to her market have a right to demand. Her capital may possibly be equal to such a competition; the industry and enterprise of her citizens, I know are not surpassed by any on the continent. There is no city in the Union I should be more unwilling to see retarded in her progress to wealth and greatness than Baltimore; but surely, sir, the interests of half a million of people are not to be delayed, or sacrificed to hasten the premature growth of any particular city.

Again, Mr. President, it is well known that many extensive manufactories, in metals especially, have been established in and about Philadelphia, Wilmington, Trenton, and other towns upon the Delaware; coal is the very basis of those manufactures; none has yet been discovered in that country, and although Virginia could of herself furnish a sufficiency for the continent, yet, owing to the difficulties and expense of transporting it around by sea in coasting vessels, the Liverpool coal now holds a successful competition with it in those markets. In these respects, and as an article of common fuel, if it could be had upon the reasonable terms this inland navigation must produce, the demand for it would be infinitely increased, and the most important manufactures of our country be greatly encouraged and improved.

Sir, it is now proposed to you to extend the patronage of Government, in a manner that can never be felt by the public, to aid in the execution of the most important national improvement ever attempted in our country—an improvement connecting two of our most extensive and commercial waters, opening of itself a commodious inland navigation to vessels of considerable burden for an extent of more than four hundred miles through the centre of the Middle States, from Norfolk, or rather from Cape Henry, to Trenton, an improvement that, although consisting only in opening a passage of about twenty miles across the isthmus, must save to all the commerce of the Susquehannah and the Delaware, inclined to seek the market of the other bay, near five hundred miles perilous navigation. And admitting that Virginia,

Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, composed the only portion of the Union that could ever be expected to derive the least possible advantage from the work, surely considering the millions that have been expended in the defence of our frontiers, in the extinguishment of Indian titles, and in the acquirement of unsettled countries, part of which they have cheerfully borne, the accommodation now asked, to every reasonable man—I beg pardon, except the gentleman from Massachusetts before me (Mr. ADAMS)—must appear most just and reasonable indeed. I will here, sir, take leave to express my pleasure, and to congratulate the cis-montain friends of the present measure, upon the prompt, the frank, and liberal conduct evinced in favor of this great public improvement in the Atlantic States, by those gentlemen who so ably represent here the interests of the western country. But, Mr. President, these private advantages, if they may be so called, that I have thus hastily and desultorily enumerated, are small, indeed, when compared to the great public utility to be expected to the Union, from the proposed work. This canal, as has been well observed by my colleague, is the first and most important link in the chain of internal navigation by which nature has designed this great confederacy of States to be cemented; the second, in point of importance, is that through Jersey from the Delaware to Amboy, or the waters of the Raritan. Then I ask you, sir, to look at the geography of your country, when the canals from the Mohawk to the waters of Oneida lake—where one is, I believe, now nearly, if not quite, completed, from the Hudson to the waters falling into lake Champlain, for which an act of the Legislature has been obtained—from Buzzard's to Boston bay, long since in contemplation, shall be carried into execution in the northern and eastern extremities of the Union; and that from Elizabeth river, in Virginia, through the Dismal Swamp, to Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds, aided by the various inlets—and very little more work in the southern extremity—we shall have a complete inland navigation from the Savannah river to the Lakes, even to Quebec, embracing the whole of the Atlantic States, and passing an extent of more than a thousand miles through our own country. Is this a subject of small consideration? I answer, confidently, no—at least to no other gentleman than the member from Massachusetts; and the case of any internal local State improvement of this kind, such as the one in Massachusetts, cited by the gentleman, in order to mar and destroy this, however entitled to the wishes and patronage of the public, cannot compare, in points of national importance, with the one we now propose.

In case of war, and God knows if we attend to the recent occurrences of our country, and contemplate the portentous events passing in the old world, we have little reason to suppose that we, even for our own short day, can be permitted to fold our arms in peace, and to indulge in slumbers of ease and safety; in the prospect of such an hour of calamity, I ask, what gentleman that hears does not anticipate me, and congratulate himself and his country upon the power he now holds, upon the means and opportunity now offered him, of facilitating the execution of a great public work, from which the most important national advantages could not fail to arise? You, sir, who, so usefully to your country, and so honorably to yourself, acquired your long and arduous experience in the active and turbulent scenes of the Revolution, must feel how incompetent I am to do justice to this part of the subject. You know well, Mr. President, the promptitude and force with which an army of observation posted upon the banks of the proposed canal, by means of that canal, could strike at any point within the whole extent of the navigable waters of the Chesapeake and the Delaware; and it could not have escaped your attention, sir, that on its very shore nature has placed, and bound with iron, a mountain, commanding the course of the canal for miles, and capable of being rendered as impregnable to an enemy as any inland situation on the Atlantic part of the Middle States. This convenient and commanding position requires only the aid of the proposed canal to force itself irresistibly upon the mind of every gentleman who will cast his eye over the map, as the very spot of all others in the Middle States best calculated to become a grand depot of arms, provisions, and military stores, in time of war. The whole peninsula presents to its front, on one extended fertile plain, an inexhaustible granary of provision; on every other side it is surrounded by a difficult, irregular country, and almost inaccessible heights, all of which it commands, and all of which, by suitable improvements, might be rendered subservient to its support. My colleague stated, I think, the facility and safety to be derived from such an inland navigation in time of war, in the transportation of troops, arms, provisions, and other military stores, and the advantages especially such a mode of conveyance would have been to the American army on their march to Yorktown; when the length of time unavoidably occupied in passing with their heavy ordnance, provisions, and baggage, this very ground—in preparing a second fleet of transports upon the Chesapeake—in debarking upon one water, and embarking upon another—might have disappointed the most glorious enterprise in the annals of the Revolution, and protracted for years the war, with all its vices, its calamities, and its expense. Sir, one of the principal modes of national defence upon which we now chiefly rely, and are providing at great expense, renders of itself this measure almost indispensable. Your gunboats might then become doubly useful in case of a foreign attack directed against the Chesapeake or the Delaware, as probable points as any other; the same squadron, by means of the canal, could operate with equal facility upon either bay, without encountering the dangers of the sea, or an enemy upon the coast. This measure must, in fact, be considered a part, and a most important part, of the same system of internal national defence; it belongs as much to the defence of the country as any fortification, battery, frigate, or gunboat, in it.

The whole amount of what we now ask to complete this great public work, even if requested as a gratuity, would not be sufficient to build and equip for sea one single ship-of-the-line, or two frigates, and yet, give me leave to say, that in time of war, to all useful purposes, this canal would be a fleet to you; fleets soon decay, but this grand and useful work would become the invaluable inheritance of posterity, as long as the inscrutable dispensations of Heaven shall permit the continent itself to hold its place.

Let us now, Mr. President, attend for a moment to the lessons of experience on this subject. In Ireland we know that, during a late invasion by the French, an army of ten thousand men completely equipped for the field was transported, to meet the invaders, by means of a canal, sixty miles in ten hours, three days' long march, and then another would probably have been necessary, to rest and prepare them for action. In England, so strong is the public sentiment on this point, that a canal has been, or is now constructing, from London to the coast of Kent, for the express purpose of aiding the national defence in case of invasion. And at the same time that canals are themselves easily defensible at all points by a very inferior force, they are perhaps the only means of defence that, falling into the hands of an enemy, cannot be turned successfully against the country, because readily liable to be rendered useless in various ways, without any permanent injury to the work. I shall not dwell, Mr. President, upon the great advantages to be expected from the measure proposed, to the commercial and manufacturing as well as to the agricultural interest; in countries where such improvements are carried on to the highest point, they all flourish most. Every gentleman here knows the great difference of expense between land and water carriage. It is stated, among other things, in the memorial of the petitioners, to which I am much indebted, that the freight of a ton, of forty cubic feet, from Europe, will generally not more than pay its land transportation thirty miles; so that the same article may cost nearly as much in land carriage across the Isthmus as in freight across the ocean; yet, sir, a very considerable commerce is now carried on in this way; some of the most commodious vessels on the continent, of their kind, as many gentlemen here know, are actively employed in it; these, with the utmost facility, would pass the canal, and their numbers and business be infinitely increased. Sir, if any object of internal improvement ever can claim the public patronage—and, with great submission, this appears to me to be one of the chief ends of government—it is the very one we now offer; we challenge a comparison with any other that can be proposed, from Maine to Georgia. And we make this appeal to the justice, the liberality, and patriotism of the Government, with the greater confidence, because, we know that in other and older countries, works of such great public utility have never been left to the feeble efforts of private individuals. In Holland, their numerous canals are all constructed and supported at the public expense. In France, the two great canals of Briaire and Languedoc remain the most lasting and useful monument of the respective monarchs that founded them. And shall we, sir, refuse the little aid proposed by this bill, to a company of patriotic individuals, who, to their infinite honor, have attempted a similar improvement in our own country? And who, after expending more than an hundred thousand dollars of private capital upon the work, we see sinking in despondency, and spiritless under the magnitude of the undertaking and the pressure of the expense? No, sir—no such contracted, miserable sentiment can influence this body. I know too well their warm and zealous attachment to the public good. This Senate will never surrender the character of the nation to the just sarcasms of every foreigner, who, in passing the country a few years hence, must see all that part of this great public work already completed in a pile of ruins, unless the aid proposed be granted. The gentleman from Massachusetts before me, (Mr. ADAMS,) has complained of our adducing upon the floor of the Senate the opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury in our favor. Sir, it became necessary to consult that officer both as to the funds and the best mode of applying them, and the liberality of his sentiments on this subject do him honor; no eulogy of mine can heighten them. I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts himself was sometimes capable of being influenced by such. And notwithstanding the doubts that have been suggested, as to the practicability of the scheme now proposed, this is reduced to a moral certainty, as must be obvious to every gentleman who has seen, or will hear and believe anything in relation to the ground over which the canal is to pass: In its whole course there are no mountains to perforate, no rocks to blow, no morasses to embank, no rivers over which to pass aqueducts, but mere plain digging through a level country of clay. And although the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) was pleased to tell us of the impossibility of forming even a rational conjecture as to the probable expense of so great an undertaking, yet sir, give me leave to tell that gentleman, and this Senate, that the managers having progressed thus far upon contracts by the square yard, are thence able to ascertain almost to a certainty the probable expense of the work before them, upon the same mathematical principle that a mechanic who had built a room twenty feet square would be able to calculate from that what would be the cost of another of thirty or forty feet square, constructed in the same manner, and of the same materials. Upon this datum is founded the calculation they have submitted to you; and, without disparagement to any others, I will here say, that no citizens of the United States are more justly entitled to your confidence. Now let me ask, Mr. President, what better disposition you could make of a small portion of your vacant lands than by applying it to aid in the execution of this great public improvement? We do not wish them for nothing, but offer you in stock the full amount of their legal price. Your object is to sell; and I am well instructed that the Government consider themselves as holding near three hundred millions of acres on this side the Mississippi, on the other side a world of unknown acres; more, vastly more, permit me to suggest, viewing the uncertainty of all human establishments, than they may ever have an opportunity of selling, at least for centuries to come, barring all accident. Why not then apply some of them now to the improvement of the country? The passing of this law will not occasion the selling a single acre less, whilst the appropriation we ask of these lands, at the same time that it must yield a great and immediate benefit to the country, will, I have no doubt, be in the end profitable to the country. For these reasons, and for others that have been assigned, I hope the Senate will approve the measure and pass the bill.

The question was then taken on the postponement of the bill to the next session of Congress, and was decided in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, February 25.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States,'" was read the second time and referred to Messrs. GILES, ADAMS, and SMITH, of Maryland, to consider and report thereon.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act making further appropriations for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States, and for building gunboats," was read the second time and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, TRACY, and MACLAY, to consider and report theron.

The bill making a further appropriation towards defraying the expense of a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, was read the second time. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read the third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate took into consideration the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808," which is as follows:

"That, having met the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives, they have mutually agreed, in conference, to recommend to pass the bill with the proviso at the end of the 8th section, amended as follows, to wit:

Provided however, That nothing in this section shall extend to prohibit the taking on board, or transporting on any river, or inland bay of the sea, within the jurisdiction of the United States, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, (not imported contrary to the provisions of the act,) in any vessel or species of craft whatever." And, also, to amend the 9th section, by striking out the word "fifty," and insert in lieu thereof "forty;" and in the second line strike out the words "as a slave, or," and insert in lieu thereof "to be."

And in section 9, line 1, strike out "fifty," and insert "forty."

And also in section 10, line 1, strike out "fifty," and insert "forty."

And the report was adopted.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and William Eaton;" also, a bill, entitled "An act providing for the payment of the expense incurred by the military preparations for the defence of the Territory of Michigan against hostile Indians, in the year 1806; in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They agree to some and disagree to other amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the office of the Secretary of the Department of War."

The two bills first mentioned in the message from the House of Representatives were read, and ordered to the second reading.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives agreeing to some and disagreeing to other amendments of the Senate to the bill last mentioned in the message.

Resolved, That they insist on their amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the said bill.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill, from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act repealing the acts laying duties on salt, and continuing in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers; and on the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 15, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Condit, Giles, Howland, Kitchel, Logan, Maclay, Milledge, Moore, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Tennessee, Smith of Vermont, Thruston, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Gilman, Hillhouse, Mitchill, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of New York, Sumter, Tracy, Turner, and White.

And the title was amended, as follows: "An act repealing an act laying a duty on salt, and continuing in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled an act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers."

The following motion was submitted for consideration by Mr. WORTHINGTON:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, at their next session, the best information he can acquire as to the usefulness, the practicability, and probable expense of the canal contemplated between the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware, from Elk river to Christiana creek, with his own opinion and reasons thereon; and a plan or plans for the application of such means as may be most convenient to the Government, and within the power of Congress, to aid in carrying into execution the same;

and whether the route adopted by the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company be the most eligible communication between the waters of the two bays; and, likewise, his opinion generally on the practicability of an inland navigation between the southern and northern extremities of the United States.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee, made on the 18th instant, on the motion to inquire whether the act passed April 18th, 1806, was correctly enrolled; and agreed to the report, as follows: Strike out, near the end of the motion, after the word "therein," these words: "to report the same, and what measures may be expedient to correct the said error," and insert "whether any measure has become necessary in consequence thereof;" and on the question to agree to the motion, amended as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of the Senate be appointed, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to inquire whether the act passed April 18, 1806, entitled "An act to repeal so much of any act or acts as authorize the receipt of evidences of the public debt in payment for the lands of the United States, and for other purposes, relative to the public debt," was enrolled as the same passed the two Houses of Congress; and, if any error hath occurred therein, whether any measure has become necessary in consequence thereof:

It was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate took into consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, the amendments reported to the joint resolution from the House of Representatives, to publish the report and chart of the survey of the coast of North Carolina, and agreed thereto; and the President having reported the resolution to the House amended accordingly, on the question, Shall this resolution be read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate took into consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, the amendments reported by the special committee to the bill sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act making appropriations for finishing the south wing of the Capitol, and for other purposes," and agreed in part thereto; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended, on motion, the further consideration of this bill was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHILL presented the petition of the inhabitants of the city of New York, stating the exposed and defenceless situation of that city, and praying that their harbor may be placed in a state of permanent and adequate defence; and the petition was read and referred to a committee this day appointed on a bill from the House of Representatives on the subject of defence.

THURSDAY, February 26.

The joint resolution for publishing the chart of the survey of the coast of North Carolina was read the third time, as amended, and passed.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act providing for the payment of the expense incurred by the military preparations for the defence of the Territory of Michigan against the hostile Indians, in the year 1806," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, WORTHINGTON, and ADAMS.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and William Eaton," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, GILES, and SUMTER, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 20th instant, to amend the Constitution of the United States, by adding a thirteenth article, respecting the judicial power thereof; and the further consideration of this motion was postponed until the next session of Congress.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee, made on the 24th instant, on the petition of Reni Naw, and agreed thereto; and the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee, made on the 24th instant, on the memorial of sundry merchants of the city of Philadelphia, on the subject of drawback; and the further consideration thereof was postponed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate, at their next session, the best information he can acquire as to the practicability, and probable expense of forming a turnpike road throughout the Atlantic States, commencing at the City of Washington, and running each way, towards the Northeastern and Southwestern extremities of the Union; together with his opinion as to the most suitable route for the same, and a plan or plans for the application of such means as may be most convenient to the Government, and within the power of Congress, to aid in carrying the same into execution.

The bill making a further appropriation towards defraying the expense of a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, was read the third time; and the first and second blanks having each been filled with the words "two hundred and fifty thousand dollars," on motion, the title was amended to read as follows: "An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," and then the bill was passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making provision for the disposal of the public lands situated between the United States' military tract, and the Connecticut Reserve, and for other purposes;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. The House of Representatives disagree to all the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act repealing the acts laying duties on salt, and continuing in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers;" and, moreover, do adhere to their bill as originally passed.

The bill from the House of Representatives first mentioned in the message was read; and, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, the bill was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. WORTHINGTON, TRACY, and BALDWIN, the committee appointed on the 8th of December last, to examine the laws of the United States providing for the sale of public lands, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for finishing the south wing of the Capitol, and for other purposes;" and the President reported to the House that the Committee of the Whole had agreed to some, and disagreed to other, amendments reported by the select committee; and had also agreed further to amend the bill.

Whereupon, a motion was made to strike out the words "twenty-five," line sixth of the bill, as reported by the select committee; and it passed in the negative.

On motion, it was agreed to strike out the word "repairing," line eighth, and insert, in lieu thereof, the words "making a new roof and other repairs."

On the question, Shall this bill be now read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to the laws respecting the insurrections, and the violation of the public peace; also, the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," reported the bill with amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Stephen Sayre;" and the bill was ordered to the third reading.

Mr. BRADLEY gave notice that he would tomorrow ask leave to bring in a bill to suspend the duties on salt, from and after the time therein specified.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives, adhering to their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act repealing the acts laying duties on salt, and continuing in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers;" and, on motion that the Senate adhere to their amendments to the said bill, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 15, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Bradley, Clay, Giles, Gilman, Hillhouse, Mitchill, Pickering, Plumer, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Smith of Tennessee, Thruston, and Tracy.

NAYS—Messrs. Condit, Gaillard, Howland, Kitchel, Logan, Maclay, Milledge, Moore, Reed, Smith of Vermont, Sumter, Turner, and Worthington.

RAPIDS OF THE OHIO.

The report of the committee, made on the 24th instant, on the subject of a canal at the Rapids of the Ohio, was considered, and is as follows:

"That they have attentively examined a survey of the Rapids of the Ohio and the adjacent shores, accompanied by explanatory notes, made by a Mr. Jared Brooks, who appears to be a skilful and intelligent engineer. That the survey exhibits the sites proposed for the canal on the Kentucky shore, and its supposed contemplated route on the Indiana side; and its accuracy is certified by nine respectable gentlemen, who, being appointed by the Kentucky Legislature to promote the execution of an act for incorporating a company for cutting the canal in question, have themselves examined the several objects delineated. Mr. Brooks has sunk, at short and convenient distances, shafts ascertaining the nature of the ground through which the canal is proposed to pass on the Kentucky shore, the various depths to the surface of the rock; and by his survey and notes has fully evinced the practicability of the object, and the superior advantages of the Kentucky over the opposite side. On the Kentucky shore the requisite depth of the canal will be less, its length not so great by at least one-third, a better bed afforded, firmer ground for its sides, and far better harbors at its head and foot. From these circumstances, it is presumed, the expense of the undertaking will not be so great by one half on the Kentucky, as upon the opposite shore, and, in Mr. Brooks's opinion, will not exceed $200,000.

"To open the canal so as to admit of the passage of vessels of any burden capable of navigating the Ohio, the Legislature of Kentucky, at their session of 1804, passed an act incorporating a company by the name of the Ohio Canal Company, which was amended by an act passed at their session of 1805. By the provisions of these acts, the company is permitted to raise a capital of $500,000, composed of shares of fifty dollars each, is vested with suitable powers to accomplish the work, and upon its completion authorized to charge reasonable tolls. On their part, the Legislature of Kentucky has directed a subscription for one thousand shares, and has invited the Governments of the United States, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, Ohio, and New York, all supposed to be more or less interested, to participate in the undertaking.

"That the work is one of great and national importance is undeniable. The immense country on the Ohio and its waters, above the Rapids, in seeking a market for its surplus products, has to encounter the obstruction in the navigation of that stream, which they present. This obstruction, never entirely free from danger, is such as to absolutely preclude the passage of vessels for several months in the year in their descent, and when laden, for the whole year in their ascent of the river. The rapidity of the current, which averages at the rate of from ten to eleven miles an hour through the falls, leaves no alternative for a safe voyage up as well as down the river, but in a canal.

"How far it is the policy of the Government to aid in works of this kind, when it has no direct interest; whether, indeed, in such a case, it has the Constitutional power of patronage and encouragement; it is not necessary to be decided in the present instance. Being the proprietor of land bordering upon the Ohio, to a greater extent than any individual State, owning, too, an invaluable saline near the Wabash, there can be no doubt that both policy and power combine in favor of promoting an undertaking by which its property is to be incidentally benefitted. If the value and price of land depend as well upon the facility with which its products find a market, as upon its capacity to produce, there can be no doubt that the public lands will be increased in value, by improvements in the navigation of those streams which water them. The saline alluded to will have its market enlarged by the opening of the proposed canal; and those above the Rapids, as well as those below, may in time count upon it as one of the sources from whence salt may be obtained.

But, as some contrariety of opinion has existed in relation to the preferable side of the Ohio for the canal; as the information upon which your committee has, on this subject, acted, is rather of an ex-parte character; and as any aid this Government may think proper to give ought only to be afforded after the most impartial and thorough investigation of the subject, they beg leave to recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President be authorized to appoint three commissioners for the purpose of examining the rapids of the Ohio, to ascertain whether a canal to avoid them be practicable, and which side of the river presents the greatest advantages for its accomplishment; and, also, whether the bed of the river is capable of being so cleared out as to admit of ascending and descending navigation, and the relative importance of a sluice and canal."

The report was agreed to.

Ordered, That Messrs. CLAY, THRUSTON, and GILES, be a committee to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. CLAY, from the above committee, agreeably to instructions, reported a bill providing for the appointment of commissioners to ascertain the practicability of removing the obstructions in the navigation of the Ohio at the Rapids; and the bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

FRIDAY, February 27.

Mr. GILES, from to committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States,'" reported the same without amendment.

Resolved, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the next session of Congress.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," together with the report of the select committee thereon; and the President, from the Committee of the Whole, reported the bill to the House amended.

On the question, Shall the bill be read a third time as amended? It was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the modifications of the amendments as reported by the committee of conference to the bill, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808;" they disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution to publish the report and chart of the survey of the coast of North Carolina. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks, and to authorize the laying out of certain public roads, and for other purposes," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned in the message was read, and ordered to the second reading.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act making appropriations for finishing the south wing of the Capitol, and for other purposes," was read the third time as amended, and passed.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act for the relief of Stephen Sayre," was read the third time, and recommitted to Messrs. TRACY, ADAMS, and BRADLEY, further to consider and report thereon.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act regulating the claims to land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate took into consideration the resolution of the House of Representatives disagreeing to their amendments to the joint resolution for publishing the report and chart of the survey of the coast of North Carolina; and,

Resolved, That they recede from their amendments disagreed to.

The Senate took into consideration the report of the committee on the memorial of sundry merchants of the city of Philadelphia on the subject of drawback, and the consideration thereof was postponed.

The bill providing for the appointment of commissioners to ascertain the practicability of removing the obstruction of the navigation of the Ohio at the Rapids, was read the second time, as in Committee of the Whole; and the President having reported the bill to the House amended, on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it passed in the affirmative.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act for the relief of Daniel S. Dexter," reported it without amendment; and the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole; and the President having reported it to the House with an amendment, on the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the postmasters of the cities of Philadelphia and New York to establish within the said cities or suburbs any number not exceeding —— offices for the reception and distribution of letters.

On this motion a short debate arose, chiefly turning on the propriety of making the inquiry more general, by extending it to all the principal towns of the Union, which terminated in the adoption of the original motion, modified by introducing the cities of Washington, Baltimore, and Charleston, and the towns of Boston and Salem—yeas 59, nays 21.

Thursday, December 4.

Another member, to wit: Thomas Blount, from North Carolina, appeared and took his seat in the House.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on the part of this House, and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Rev. Mr. Elliot.

Mr. J. Randolph, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of yesterday, asked leave to report by bill; which having been given, Mr. R. reported the following bill:

An Act to suspend the operation of an act, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise," and to remit the penalties incurred under the same.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the operation of the act, passed on the 8th day of April last, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise," be, and the same hereby is, suspended until the —— day of —— next.

And be it further enacted, That all penalties, fines, and forfeitures, which may have been incurred by virtue of the provisions of the aforesaid act, be, and the same hereby are, respectively remitted. This act shall take effect from and after the passing thereof.

Read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

Mr. Lewis called the attention of the House to the subject of erecting a bridge across the Potomac, which had been fully discussed the last session. Owing to the late period of the session, or to some other circumstance, the bill, which had passed the House for this purpose, had been postponed by the other branch of the Legislature to this session. That the subject might again receive a full investigation, he moved the reference of the report of the select committee, together with all the documents connected with the business, to a select committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise; which motion was agreed to—yeas 57, nays 29.

Mr. Lewis, Mr. Magruder, Mr. Casey, Mr. Covington, and Mr. Goodwyn, were appointed the committee.

Friday, December 5.

Another member, to wit: Evan Alexander, from North Carolina, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Ordered, That Mr. Garnett be excused from serving on the Committee of Ways and Means; and that Mr. John Randolph be appointed of the said committee, in his place.

NON-IMPORTATION ACT.

On motion of Mr. John Randolph, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to suspend the operation of an act, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise," and to remit the penalties incurred under the same.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the operation of the act passed on the 18th day of April last, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise," be, and the same hereby is, suspended until the —— day of —— next.

And be it further enacted, That all penalties, fines, and forfeitures, which may have been incurred by virtue of the provisions of the aforesaid act, be, and the same hereby are, respectively remitted. This act shall take effect from and after the passing thereof.

The first section of the bill having been read—

Mr. J. Randolph said, there were two periods mentioned in the select committee, which reported the bill, as proper to fill the blank in the first section; the first was the first day of June; the other, some time within the next session of Congress, say the 31st of December. It would be recollected that, in the Message of the President, the suspension of the act, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise," is recommended on two motives; the first a motive of conciliation towards Great Britain; the second, from a regard to our own convenience. It was supposed, in the select committee, that if the act should be suspended for a very short period, it would answer neither of these purposes; that the news of the expiration of the suspending law reaching Great Britain about the time the passage of the law was known, it would, as to all the purposes of conciliation, be unsatisfactory; and, at the same time, that the merchants would not be able to send their orders abroad in time to receive returns before the act should again be suspended in its operation and effect. Under this view of the subject, the major part of the committee, at the instigation of two gentlemen representing commercial towns, were of opinion that the suspension should extend into the next session. They were likewise of this opinion on other grounds. If the act should be suspended to a period between this and the ensuing session, it might so happen as to take effect after our differences with Great Britain should be accommodated. They were of this opinion from another consideration. If, unfortunately, and contrary to the present prospect, the negotiation should fail, and an open rupture ensue between the two nations, the committee were not of opinion that the suspension of the prohibitory act, for a few months, would be of material importance on the interests of either party; but that measures of a stronger character would be required. Mr. R. said, he had thus given the views which influenced the committee. The committee would fill the blank with either day, as it should suit their pleasure. He would move to fill it with the 31st day of December, in order to try their sense; at the same time, he did not feel it important that the blank should be filled with that day, or any other.

Mr. Smilie observed, that there were two points which appeared to him to contain the marrow of the bill; the first was, whether the prohibitory act should be suspended? and the second, to what time the suspension should be made? The last point, it was more difficult to agree about than the other. He would suggest, whether it would not be best to leave the blank unfilled until the third reading of the bill? By pursuing this course, time would be allowed members to reflect on the subject. He was himself not altogether prepared to say what would be the proper period. He was friendly to the suspension, but he had not made up his mind as to the time.

Mr. J. Clay said, it was usual to fill up the blanks in Committee of the Whole. If his colleague were not disposed to agree to filling the bill with the 31st December, it would be easy, when the bill should be considered in the House, to vote against concurring in the report of the committee.

Mr. Findley said both modes of filling blanks were usual, and either was pursued, according to the convenience of the House. As filling the blank, in this instance, was of great importance, and as the House had as yet had little time to reflect upon it, he hoped the motion to fill the blank would be postponed until the bill was carried into the House. He was friendly to the principle of the bill, but had not made up his mind with regard to the period for which it would be best to suspend the prohibitory act.

The question being put, the motion to fill the blank with the 31st of December was disagreed to—ayes 48, noes 62.

The Chairman having read the second section—

Mr. R. Nelson declared himself unprepared to give his vote upon it. If he recollected the provisions of the existing laws, they gave to the informer a part of the penalty accruing from their infraction. The United States, however they might give up the penalties which had accrued to them, had no right to remit that part of them which had become the property of the informer. He submitted, therefore, the propriety of so amending this section as to save the rights of the latter.

The several provisions of the laws on this subject having been read, a debate of considerable length arose on the necessity of the proposed amendment.

Its necessity was contended for by Messrs. R. Nelson, G. W. Campbell, Dawson, and Findley, and opposed by Messrs. J. Clay, Bidwell, J. Randolph, and Crowninshield.

By the former gentlemen it was contended that a vested right became attached to the informer, or officer of customs, which the United States could not morally divest; and that, although the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized by law to remit all forfeitures, yet that Congress could not themselves remit them.

On the other hand, it was maintained that Congress, having given the entire power of remission of forfeitures to the Secretary of the Treasury, were as competent themselves to remit as he was, and that the power which they had bestowed on an inferior Executive officer they were themselves competent to exercise.

In the course of this argument, Mr. G. W. Campbell moved that the Committee should rise, and ask leave to sit again.

This motion was, however, withdrawn, under the impression that the blank would not be filled until the third reading of the bill.

The Committee then rose, and reported their agreement to the bill without amendment.

Mr. Dawson, to try the sense of the House on the point discussed in Committee, offered the following amendment:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the right or claim of any person, to any part of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, incurred by the breach of the act aforesaid, which such person shall or may be entitled to, by virtue of the said law, in cases where a prosecution has been commenced or information has been given, before the passing of this act; the amount of which right and claim shall be assessed and valued by a proper judge or court in a summary manner.

The argument, commenced in Committee, was resumed by the same gentlemen, when the question was taken, and the amendment disagreed to—ayes 12.

Mr. J. Randolph said, after what had passed, the House would not ascribe to him a wish to precipitate the decision on filling the blank in the first section. He had, indeed, no such intention. When in Committee, he had avoided saying anything as to the principle or expediency of the measure; nor should he touch these points, if at all, till the question whether the bill should pass, or not, was fairly before the House? But, he would appeal to gentlemen, whether the interests of the United States could be materially affected by an additional suspension for three days, three weeks, or three months? The subject had been very fully debated the last session, and gentlemen could surely make up their minds whether it were best for the suspension to operate to the end of the session, or to the 30th of June, or to a later period? This was one of those minor questions that did not require much time for consideration, and having decided that the suspension should not be extended to the 31st of December, there could be little difficulty in fixing an intermediate day. He should, therefore, move to fill the blank with the 30th of June, although he did not mean to press the motion. He understood that was the quarter day at the Treasury.

Mr. Alston said, when he voted in Committee, against filling the blank with the 31st of December, it was not because he was absolutely against that day, but because his mind was not made up with respect to the most proper day at which to limit the suspension. He had heard nothing since to satisfy his mind on this head. He hoped, therefore, that the blank would not be filled until the third reading of the bill.

Mr. J. Clay remarked that, when he seconded the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. J. Randolph,) it was with a perfect knowledge that it would be competent to the House to fill the blank on the third reading of the bill. But, he would ask, whether there would not exist a difficulty in fixing the period of suspension at any day short of the commencement of the next session of Congress? And, if there were, whether there would not arise a necessity of placing somewhere a dispensing power? He hoped, from all he could collect, that all differences between the two Governments would, before that day, be removed. Well, suppose a treaty, in all respects perfectly satisfactory, should be concluded, and the prohibitory act only suspended until the 30th of June, without any power existing to dispense with it? The bill must again go into effect notwithstanding all the causes which gave rise to it have ceased. He believed it was not competent to amend a bill on its third reading, unless by unanimous consent. For this reason, he wished that the blank might be filled with the 30th of June, and an amendment introduced, authorizing a further suspension, in case our differences shall be adjusted. If this course were adopted, he believed every gentleman would be satisfied.

Mr. Smilie moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill to Monday.

Mr. J. Randolph hoped that, if the consideration of the bill were postponed, it would not be till Monday. He considered the bill of some importance to two classes of persons; to the merchants, and still more so to the Southern planters. It was considered, by those who understood its operation, as of material importance to the cotton planters. He supposed, between this day and to-morrow, every gentleman would be able to make up his mind whether it would be expedient to suspend the prohibitory law for three, six, or nine months. The period appeared to him comparatively an unimportant question; whereas, that of the bill coming soon into operation, was of great importance to the planters. If passed, it would have a considerable effect on orders abroad and projects at home. If a postponement took place, he hoped the House would adjourn till to-morrow, and its consideration be then resumed. As the other House were generally more tardy in their proceedings, it could scarcely be expected to get in operation in less than eight or ten days; and that period would be taken from the period of suspension, short as it might be.

The motion to postpone the bill to Monday was disagreed to—ayes 29.

Mr. SMILIE then moved a postponement till to-morrow; which was carried—ayes 60.

In the course of the debate, Mr. R. NELSON remarked, as an inducement to the prompt passage of the bill, that he was informed that Mr. Merry, the late British Minister, about to sail for England, was waiting to learn the fate of it.

SATURDAY, December 6.

NON-IMPORTATION ACT.

The House proceeded to consider the bill to suspend the operation of an act, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise," and to remit the penalties incurred under the same; when the first section thereof being again read, in the words following, to wit:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the operation of the act, passed on the eighteenth day of April last, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise," be, and the same hereby is, suspended until the —— day of —— next.

The SPEAKER observed that when the bill was yesterday under consideration, the question pending was on filling the blank in the first section with the words "June 30," (the day until which it was proposed to suspend the prohibitory act.)

At the request of Mr. J. RANDOLPH, the Message of the President of the 3d instant was read.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH then said, that when he had made the motion in committee to fill the blank with the 30th of June, he had done it under the impression that the House had expressed their disapprobation of a suspension to so long a day as the 31st of December. But it seemed, from some observations which had been made in the House, that some gentlemen who voted against the suspension until the next session, had voted in this way, not because they were opposed to that day, but merely because they had not fully considered the subject. He would, therefore, withdraw his motion to fill the blank with the 30th of June, and renew his motion to fill it with the 31st day of December. He did this, not only from the motives he had mentioned, but from other motives, which struck his mind with great force, and which, if gentlemen attended to them, they would find of considerable weight. Gentlemen have said that they are disposed to pass the suspending law, because the conduct of Great Britain, which they deemed the last year hostile to us, had since materially changed. Now if this were a fact, (the accuracy of which he was not about at present to discuss,) what was the inference? If at the last session, when gentlemen deemed the conduct of Great Britain hostile to us, they suspended the operation of the prohibitory act to the 15th of November ensuing, surely, a fortiori, gentlemen, who deemed the conduct of that Government so materially changed, would agree to a suspension for a period as much longer as would be equivalent to the change in her conduct. It might be said that the reason for the suspension at the last session did not now exist, as it was then necessary to give a greater length of notice of the going into operation of so important a law. True; but no gentleman would say that a period, so long as that allowed, was then necessary, as it was only requisite, in this point of view, to allow time for the information of the passage of the act to be received before the sailing of the Spring vessels. Under this view of the subject, he would renew his motion to fill the blank with the 31st day of December.

Mr. ELLIOT hoped the motion would prevail. He, indeed, very much regretted that it had been negatived in Committee of the Whole. He had never considered the prohibitory act as valuable, but as indicating the spirit of the American people, and as leading the way to stronger measures in case the conduct of Great Britain should require them. He was willing to part with it for a reasonable disposition towards accommodation on the part of Great Britain, which they had been assured existed at present. In the present state of our foreign affairs, when a European Power had frequently invaded our territory, he thought there were strong reasons for being on good terms with Great Britain. He contemplated the prohibitory law as a mere matter of temporary policy, not as forming a part of a permanent system of commercial warfare with Great Britain. Mr. E. said there was one reason, which ought to decide the vote of the House on this question. If gentlemen viewed the prohibitory law as a mere matter of temporary policy, and if, as they had been assured by the Executive, the pending negotiations were likely to issue in a satisfactory result, surely they ought no longer to keep the agricultural and commercial interests in suspense, as to the measures contemplated to be pursued on our arrangements with Great Britain. For one, he should be willing, after the assurances they had received of the friendly disposition of the British Government, and from his sense of the inefficiency of the law, to repeal it altogether. And although gentlemen should be disposed to hold it up in terrorem to Great Britain, why not suspend it for a year, or, at all events, permit the suspension to cease during a session of Congress? Suppose a majority shall say that the suspending act shall cease in June or July, the non-importation act will then be again in force. How, then, can our merchants with any safety take their measures? Why leave the subject in doubt, when they were convinced that the spirit which presides over the pending negotiations will produce a favorable result? For these reasons Mr. E. said he hoped the present motion would prevail.

Mr. BIDWELL observed that with the gentleman from Vermont, who had just sat down, he could say that the prohibitory act, the operation of which was proposed to be suspended, received his vote at the time of its passage. But, like him, he could not add, that his view of the policy of the measure had changed. Further reflection had confirmed him in the belief of its wisdom and justice; and experience, during the short period which has intervened, has added the weight of its sanction. The act had, so far, evidently produced a salutary effect. He had no hesitation in saying that it had an influence in producing the accommodating spirit which, at the date of the last despatches from our Commissioners, was manifested on the part of Great Britain towards the United States. Convinced of the soundness of our policy, he should by no means be willing to see it abandoned by a repeal of the act. On the contrary, he hoped the act would be retained and enforced, and that further steps would be taken in the same system of policy, unless it should be rendered unnecessary by satisfactory conventional arrangements. Yet, consistently with this system, he was willing, for the reasons stated in the President's Message, to suspend the operation of the act for a reasonable time, but not for so long a time as had been moved by the gentleman from Virginia. The object of the proposed suspension was twofold: First, to meet a conciliatory disposition on the part of Great Britain, with the proof of a disposition equally conciliatory on our part; and, secondly, to give a full and fair opportunity for concluding a negotiation, which had been delayed by causes not of a suspicious or unfriendly nature. If we had reason to believe that the delay was an intentional procrastination for the purpose of deluding us, or for gaining time to take advantage of events, it would be a sufficient objection to any suspension. But he saw no ground for such a suspicion. They were assured that the negotiation was in a favorable train, and promised a result mutually advantageous. He would, therefore, give full time for its conclusion. Neither of the objects proposed by a suspension, however, required so long a time as until the last of December. Both of them would be satisfied by carrying the suspension to the first of July. The intervening period would, after making allowance for all ordinary obstacles, afford sufficient opportunity for the act to be transmitted to London, to produce its due effect there, and admit a return of the result. More than that ought not to be allowed. It would be going beyond the objects of the suspension. It would, in the event of a failure of the negotiation, give an unnecessary protraction to the operation of our prohibitory law. It would evince an unstable or doubtful policy, and excite a suspicion of our sincerity, or at least of our capacity to enforce the system we have adopted. By a suspension to the first of July, we should admit the Spring importations, and thereby show a proper attention to the interests of our merchants, without permitting the Fall importations. The event of a treaty, in the meantime, might be provided for by a separate clause in this bill, or, which he should prefer, by a separate act to be passed, if necessary, before the close of the session. For these reasons he hoped the motion to fill the blank with the 31st of December would not prevail, but that it would be filled with the first of July, agreeably to a motion which had been made and withdrawn, but which he took the liberty to renew.

Mr. SLOAN said he hoped the motion to fill the blank with so late a period as the 31st of December would not prevail. He hoped also that the House would take up the subject with that seriousness which its magnitude required. He should not recapitulate the causes which had induced Congress at their last session to pass the prohibitory act, as they must be in the recollection of the House. But he would ask gentlemen one question of serious import. What facts had occurred to induce the House to suspend this act? A friendly disposition manifested by the Ministry of Great Britain. This was the utmost extent of the ground on which it was proposed to legislate. He would ask whether it was sufficient ground to induce a suspension for so long a time? He was willing to meet friendly dispositions on the part of Britain by friendly dispositions on our part. But did it appear that anything had been done which was permanent or binding? No. They had not been informed that a single preliminary article had been agreed upon. It was true that there was for the present a suspension of aggression on our commerce and seamen; he was, therefore, in favor of a suspension of the prohibitory act for a very short period. But he hoped that both the motions which had been made would be rejected, and an earlier day, about the close of the session, be introduced, and that the President might be empowered further to suspend the act, if occasion should require, until the next meeting of Congress.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD said he could not but regret that the gentleman from Virginia, after the vote in the Committee of the Whole, should have withdrawn his motion to fill the blank with the 30th day of June. When he was up yesterday, some expressions had dropped from him of the confidence he entertained with regard to the friendly disposition of Great Britain, in her commercial relations with this country. Though that was his opinion, grounded on the information contained in the Message of the President, he had always considered the measures of Great Britain as founded on a system of policy hostile to our growing commercial greatness. If she found our policy wavering, it was very possible she might renew her former depredations on our commerce. It would be recollected that it was a very long period after the remonstrances were made by our Ministers, before any attention was paid to them, or they received an answer. Several months at least elapsed. It had always appeared to him that the conduct of Great Britain had in this instance been governed by the state of the Continent, and that she had been controlled by continental events. It must, too, be acknowledged that she had never seriously entered into negotiation with us until the passage of the prohibitory act. Mr. C. said it was his opinion if we had not acted with spirit Britain never would have negotiated with us. Such being his opinion, he was in favor of continuing the prohibitory law, or of suspending it only for a short time. He was therefore opposed to filling the blank with the 30th of December. With regard to his own individual opinion he did not know whether he should be for making the suspension go beyond the present session; for if events should favor a new coalition, it was very probable her depredations would be renewed. Although appearances were flattering, she was undoubtedly governed by events, and might in future change her conduct. He could not agree that we ought to be influenced by some clouds in the Western country embodied by another nation. It would make no difference in his conduct towards Great Britain if the country were invaded even to Washington. He would still persist in the same policy. There was no doubt that the United States could resist a combination of all Europe. Great Britain at present appeared to be friendly, and the negotiations might issue in some commercial arrangements, but which might not prove satisfactory to the House. He did not, therefore, wish to give up the law for so long a time. He might agree to its suspension to the first of July. He did not think the interest of the merchants ought to be considered with regard to their Spring importations, because they had already imported a sufficiency of the prohibited articles; and if the interests of the merchants were to be attended to in all such cases, it would be impossible for the Government to get along. Besides, a great part of the prohibited articles might be got from other countries, at prices but little exceeding the British. From this view of the subject, he thought the period of suspension ought to be entirely determined by its effect on the negotiations. So far as this consideration recommended a suspension he was willing to go. But he could not consent to so long a period as that proposed, which almost doubled that agreed upon at the last session.

Mr. Smilie said that when he agreed to the passage of the prohibitory law, it was from a conviction that it would produce salutary effects. Such was then his impression, and such was his present opinion. It was true that he wished to impose no commercial restrictions upon the trade of Great Britain, provided she would treat us as a friendly nation. The act had been passed as an inducement to her to review her conduct, and to do us justice. Entertaining still the same views and feelings, and believing the measure was calculated to produce the best effects, he still remained a firm and decided friend of the law. As soon as the desired effects were produced he should cease to wish for its continuance. But until they were produced he should never consent to part with it. From the Message of the President, it appeared that it was his opinion, as well as that of our Ministers, who were undoubtedly the best qualified to judge, that a temporary suspension of the law would have a favorable effect on the pending negotiations. He was, therefore, willing to suspend it; but not for so long a period as that mentioned. A suspension until the 1st of July would allow ample time for its effect on the negotiations. If, during the course of the session, circumstances should arise requiring a change of policy, they could be easily provided for. They were then just on the verge of the session. Despatches would undoubtedly be received before they rose, from which they would learn what was best to be done. For these reasons Mr. Smilie hoped the blank would be filled with the 1st day of July.

Mr. J. Randolph rose merely to observe that it was usual for gentlemen to renew in the House, motions made in the Committee of the Whole. It was true he had not renewed this motion yesterday, because he did then understand the vote in the Committee of the Whole as expressing the disapprobation of the House of so long a period of suspension as the 31st day of December. But after he had received information that several gentlemen, who had voted against the motion, did not consider it in this light, he had renewed the motion. Mr. R. said he really did not see it, nor could he be induced to believe it to be a question of great importance, whether the suspension should be for six or twelve months. The principle of the bill was as much involved in one period as the other. He thought the whole reasoning of gentlemen went to show that the suspension ought not to extend beyond the present session. It was evident that this was not the opinion of the President, who, in his Message, recommends the suspension, as well with a view to the promotion of our own commercial purposes, as to favor the negotiations. Great Britain having indicated a conciliatory temper, did it not become a point of policy towards her to suspend this act for a reasonable time? If, too, the suspension be limited to some day when we are not in session, may not great inconvenience arise? Gentlemen on the committee with him would recollect that he named the 3d day of March; but at the suggestion of two gentlemen from two great commercial cities a further time was deemed necessary; and it did appear to him, if it were extended beyond the 3d of March, it should be to a day which would fall into the next session. However, in case the suspension should be limited to an intermediate day, he had prepared a clause further to suspend the act in case a treaty should be formed, which, in that event, he would offer.

Mr. Alston said he was still, as he expressed himself yesterday, in considerable doubt as to the proper time to which the act passed at the last session, prohibiting certain articles from being imported into the United States, should be suspended. It was then adopted with a view to aid our negotiations with Great Britain; and as the negotiations with the Government it was intended to operate against, were still pending, the same cause which produced its passage in the first instance, operated upon his mind as to the propriety of continuing the law; but he was perfectly willing to suspend its going into effect, until ample time should be afforded for a termination of the negotiations now pending.

He did not believe that in the event of a failure of an adjustment of differences by the negotiation now on foot, war with that country would follow, nor that there would be a necessity for any stronger measures on our part to be taken; once permit the law to go into operation, and he believed its effects would be as forcibly felt by that country as any measure we could adopt. He was opposed to a suspension to the time proposed (which was the 31st of December next) for several reasons; for instance, should our expectations of a friendly adjustment of differences fail, and the event be known in the course of two or three months, everybody, particularly those in favor of the system, would say it ought to apply to the next fall importations. Again, if we put it off until the time proposed, it would seem as though we ourselves were afraid of the ground we had taken, and never intended it to take effect. The ground taken by the gentleman from Vermont, which was, that we ought to be in session at the time to which the law should be suspended, was to his mind very forcible; he felt a great repugnance to delegating a power to any person whatever to suspend the operation of a law of Congress; but, as was mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Bidwell,) a clause could be introduced specially authorizing the President of the United States, in case of certain events taking place, to suspend the law, and that only until the next session of Congress. A special delegation of this kind would not be an abandonment of the principle he contended for. He, therefore, felt himself under the necessity of voting against filling up the blank with the time proposed.

The yeas and nays were then taken on filling the blank with the 31st of December, and were—yeas 45, nays 67, as follows:

Yeas—George M. Bedinger, Silas Betton, James M. Broom, John Boyle, John Campbell, Martin Chittenden, Samuel W. Williams, Alexander Wilson, and Joseph Winston.

The question was then put on filling it with the 1st of July.

Mr. J. Randolph said this seemed to be a very important question, though he really did not see it in that light. He hoped, however, they would have the yeas and nays; which, being taken, were—yeas 97, nays 12, as follows:

Yeas—Evan Alexander, Willis Alston, jr., Isaac Anderson, David Bard, Joseph Barker, Burwell Bassett, George M. Bedinger, Silas Betton, Barnabas Bidwell, John Blake, jr., Thomas Blount, James M. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without a division.

Mr. J. Randolph moved that it should be read a third time to day.

Mr. Crowninshield named Tuesday.

The question on the last motion was passed in the negative without a division, as was that for reading the bill on Monday, when the motion to read it to-day was carried without a division.

The bill was immediately brought in engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. Sloan said he should vote in the negative, not because he was against the principle of the bill, but the time. He thought it ought to be kept in the power of the House to the end of the session.

Mr. Alexander said he did not know whether it was in order, in this state of the bill, to offer an amendment, with which the bill would have his hearty vote. The amendment, he considered necessary, had been alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia. So far as he had reflected on the subject he thought the period of suspension in the bill sufficient. But he was of opinion that a suspending power should be vested in the President, in case necessity should require its exercise. He was of the same opinion last session; and had such a provision been then introduced, it would have superseded the necessity of this act.

Mr. Smilie remarked that he would not undertake to say that some other steps might not be necessary before they rose. But there was no necessity for taking any other step at present. He thought it would be improper to take any further steps at present.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill by yeas and nays—yeas 101, nays 5, as follows:

Yeas—Evan Alexander, Willis Alston, jun., Isaac Anderson, Joseph Barker, Burwell Bassett, George M. Bedinger, Silas Betton, Barnabas Bidwell, John Blake, jun., Thomas Blount, James M. Monday, December 8.

Another new member, to wit: John Porter, from Pennsylvania, returned to serve as a member for the said State, in the place of Michael Leib, who had resigned his seat, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House. Several other members, to wit: from New York, Eliphalet Wickes; from Maryland, John Archer; and from North Carolina, Marmaduke Williams; appeared, and took seats in the House.

Mr. Darby presented to the House a petition of the members of the Baptist congregation, in the City of Washington, in the Territory of Columbia, signed by order and in behalf of the said congregation, by Thomas Carpenter, and others, which was received and read, praying that an act of incorporation may be passed, vesting in the said church such powers, privileges, and immunities, as Congress in their wisdom may deem proper, for the benefit and advantage of the said congregation.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Messrs. Darby, Archer, and Seaver, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. Boyle, from the Committee on Public Lands, made a report on the petition of sundry inhabitants of Ovid, in the State of New York, requesting permission to purchase an entire township of land on the White or Wabash river, in the Indiana Territory. The committee observe that as, under the existing provision of law, the right exists to purchase an entire township, with the exception of the reserved sections, they presume that the object of the petitioners, though not specified, is to make the purchase on lower terms than are ordinary. Considering an adherence to the established terms of great importance to the public interests, they recommend that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

In this report, the House concurred.

DEPOSITS OF PUBLIC MONEY.

Mr. Crowninshield submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to furnish the House of Representatives with a statement of the amount of deposits of the public money in the United States and other banks, for the three last years, together with an estimate of the balances in favor of the United States remaining in the said banks respectively for that period, distinguishing the amount in each year.

Mr. C. said, he would candidly inform the House what his views were in offering this motion. His object was to draw a revenue from the balances which might be in the banks, by taxing the Bank of the United States, and other banks with an interest on the amount of the public money in their hands. He had made a calculation, from which he inferred that the amount of balances in their hands for the three last years averaged the sum of between three and four millions. If a charge of six per cent. interest were made on this amount, it would produce a revenue of from one hundred and eighty to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Mr. C. said he thought this as fair a source of revenue as any other which could be named; it was certainly as fair a one as articles imported from foreign countries. It was unnecessary at this time to make further explanations. He hoped the House would permit the resolution to pass, that they might have laid before them the information on which he meant to predicate his plan.

The House immediately took up the resolution and agreed to it without a division.

Mr. D. R. Williams observed that, from an apprehension of the state of the ceiling, he had kept his seat not without considerable alarm. This induced him to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be authorized to cause immediate measures to be taken for pulling down the plastering, or otherwise securing the ceiling of the Chamber in which the sessions of the House are now held.

A conversation of some length took place on this motion, in which it was stated that, notwithstanding the assurance of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, the plastering of the ceiling presented strong indications of insecurity, so much so as to have swagged in some places more than half an inch; that in another part of the House it had actually fallen, and that the examination, on which the opinion of Mr. Latrobe was grounded, having been so long ago as the year 1805, could not give any satisfaction as to present security. When the question was put, and the resolution agreed to—ayes 59, noes 34.

A motion was made to adjourn over till Friday, but withdrawn, that the Speaker might have time before the meeting of the House to-morrow to gain the necessary information as to the steps proper to be taken.

Tuesday, December 9.

The Speaker laid before the House the result of the examination made in his presence by the Clerk of the Public Works relative to the situation of the ceiling of the House, as well as the written replies made by the Clerk to sundry questions put to him, the purport of which is the preponderating opinion of the Clerk that the ceiling is secure. This opinion is however qualified by a doubt with respect to the safety of a part of the ceiling. The Clerk further states, that to secure this part of the ceiling will require two days, and that securing the whole will take a week.

After some conversation on the subject, Mr. Ely offered a resolution for suspending all further proceedings under the order of yesterday, which was negatived—yeas 40, nays 51; the Speaker having previously intimated to the House that unless special order was taken by them he should cause, as soon as an adjournment took place, measures to be taken for securing the ceiling.

Mr. Bidwell, from the committee appointed on the third instant, presented, according to order, a bill to revive and make permanent "An act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses," and in addition to the same; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

On motion of Mr. Lattimore,

Ordered, That so much of the petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, presented to this House on the twenty-fifth of January, one thousand eight hundred and five, as relates to the establishment of a hospital at the town of Natchez; an increase of the salaries of the Judges; and an extension of the right of suffrage, in the aforesaid Territory; be referred to a select committee; and that Mr. Thomas M. Randolph, Mr. Lattimore, Mr. Taggart, Mr. Wickes, and Mr. Hamilton, be the said committee.

On motion of Mr. Clark,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the act for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to lands within the Territory of Orleans, and District of Louisiana; and to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Lewis, from the committee appointed on the fourth instant, presented a bill authorizing the erection of a bridge over the river Potomac, within the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

On motion of Mr. Jeremiah Morrow,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of offering for sale the public land situate between the United States' military tract and the Connecticut Reserve, to which the Indian title has been extinguished; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. J. Clay remarked that under an existing rule of the House, the member first named on committees was the chairman, unless another member was chosen by the committee; and that he was instructed to state that, in virtue of the last provision, the Committee of Ways and Means had appointed Mr. J. Randolph, chairman.

Wednesday, December 10.

On motion of Mr. Thomas,

Ordered, That the report of the Commissioners under the act, entitled "An act for the relief of the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia," which was made to this House on the twenty-first of April last, be referred to Mr. Thomas, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Green, with leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

Thursday, December 11.

Another member, to wit: John G. Jackson, from Virginia, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. J. Clay presented to the House a petition of sundry patentees, whose names are thereunto subscribed, praying the privilege of a renewal of their patent for a second term, after the expiration of the first, for the exclusive enjoyment of their respective discoveries and improvements, they paying therefor, into the Treasury of the United States, such sums as may be deemed just and reasonable.—Referred to Mr. J. Clay, Mr. Jones, Mr. Livingston, Mr. Alexander, and Mr. Elmer; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

On motion of Mr. Stanton,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, description of claims against the United States are barred by the statutes of limitation, which, in reason and justice, ought to be provided for by law; and that the said committee have leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. Stanton, Mr. Tenney, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Dana, Mr. Tracy, Mr. Lambert, Mr. Pugh, Mr. Broom, Mr. Nicholas R. Moore, Mr. John Morrow, Mr. Stanford, Mr. Thomas Moore, Mr. Meriwether, Mr. Reed of Tennessee, Mr. Bedinger, and Mr. Jeremiah Morrow, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Clopton.—Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity, when the attention of the House is not occupied on any particular subject, to submit a resolution, the subject-matter of which I consider to be of very great importance. Before, however, I introduce to the notice of the House any specific proposition, I would observe that, when the subject shall be discussed, if discussed at all, I apprehend that it may meet with some objection on a general ground, on which, most probably, objection would be raised against any measure whatsoever of the nature of that which I am about to propose. If the ideas I entertain of its expediency arose merely from my own speculative views of the proposition and the subject with which it is connected, however clearly I might be convinced, of that expediency, I might nevertheless distrust the propriety of such conviction, so far at least as not to be induced thereby merely of itself to bring forward the proposition: but a conviction scarcely susceptible of any distrust at all, and far more impressive on my mind; a conviction, which has resulted from experience, induces me to offer the proposition; and in doing so, I feel much more of duty than of any other impulse.

The proposition, which I have thus deemed it my duty to submit to the consideration of the House, might appear sufficiently expedient in consequence of certain measures adopted some years ago, had no subsequent circumstance enlarged the evidence of its expediency; but recent, very recent circumstances present themselves to my mind as additional proof of that expediency. Sir, in the instances I have alluded to, we have witnessed a striking exemplification of the truth of that maxim, which ascribes to experience a standard the least fallible of any by which human institutions can be tested. It is from experience only that defects are often discovered in the wisest of establishments. This unfolds the latent sources of evil, which could not have been traced by the most penetrating foresight. The efforts of genius, however great, and of patriotism, however pure, cannot always secure the ends they propose. Means apparently infallible are found either to be inadequate to the end, or to contain within themselves the very instruments by which they are defeated. Imperfections overlooked and believed not to exist, until experience rends the veil, are then disclosed and glare before us. And, sir, amongst all the institutions of men there are none, perhaps, in which their defects generally lie so much enveloped, as in those of a political nature, until they are thus disclosed.

I have said that I anticipate some objection upon a ground, on which, most probably, objection would be raised against any measure whatsoever, of the nature of that which I am about to submit to the consideration of the House. Should this, however, be the principal ground of opposition, if the object of the proposition should be deemed desirable, that ground, I might reasonably presume, will be abandoned as untenable.

I have been led, sir, to conjecture that opposition of the nature of that which I have suggested, might be expected from recollection of a former occasion, when an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was under discussion. On that occasion, the House was admonished against innovation, as it was called, and solemnly advised, on no account whatsoever, to touch the Constitution. This was done, although the proposed amendment had been long promulgated to the American people; although the public sentiment had been clearly ascertained to be in its favor, and although eleven successive amendments had been introduced into the Constitution without a shadow of inconvenience, or the smallest degree to the disturbance of the public tranquillity. Had the Constitution been adopted without any provision for future alterations, and none were attainable but by immediate resort to revolutionary principles, opposition made upon that ground would then, indeed, merit serious notice. But a provision wisely and completely guarding against every event of that sort, composes a part of the Constitution. Fortunate provision! Happy Americans, who enjoy the benefits of that provision! Who, when experience points out defects in their great political code, without a resort to first principles, without the smallest danger of those revolutions which shock and convulse other nations, with calm and tranquil serenity, may correct whatever needs correction, and ameliorate their system. Far from being dangerous, therefore, to introduce any amendment, where it shall have been found by experience to be really expedient, the introduction of it will be a salutary step; may be the happy means of averting danger in future times, and of removing a source of evil which, were it to continue, might diffuse its streams through the whole body politic. Under this impression, and from a belief that a certain part of the Constitution requires amendment, with permission of the House, I shall introduce a resolution which has that for its object. The amendment which is desired, will not however introduce any new principle into the Constitution, nor any way increase the powers of the Federal Government, should it be adopted. The object of it is solely to secure an adherence to that fundamental principle which forms its true federal character. And because it is believed there have been deviations from that principle; that certain measures, which have been alluded to, were the offspring of a power not within the scope of that principle, but entirely without the sphere of the federal authority; because, also, the exercise of such a power was grounded on a peculiar construction given to one clause in the Constitution, the proposition now intended to be submitted is of such a nature that, on the decision of it, Congress will determine whether such a modification of that clause shall be proposed to the States as shall render it less susceptible of such construction. The clause I mean, is the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, expressed in these words:

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

The construction which has been given to this clause, in the cases alluded to, was, that it conveys to Congress a right to make any laws whatsoever, which they should determine to be expedient for carrying into execution the powers enumerated in this section, or in any other part of the Constitution, whether such laws should have any sort of relation to, or connexion with, any of those enumerated powers or not. Under this construction the ever-to-be execrated sedition act was passed; it was passed as a measure expedient, necessary, and proper, for carrying into execution the said enumerated powers, with none of which powers had it any more connexion than pitchy darkness has with the blaze of a meridian sun.

Such a latitude of construction at that time excited a considerable degree of alarm in the minds of those who were impressed with a belief of its dangerous tendency. To them nothing could have been more desirable than such a correction of the clause as would have restricted the construction of it to limits merely commensurate with the powers expressly delegated; but the then existing state of things precluded every ray of hope that any attempt to obtain such correction at that time could be successful. A different state of things exists at present, it is true, and I hope there is no disposition to resort to a system of policy like that which dictated those measures. Yet, it should be remembered, there is a "tide"—there is a flux and a reflux in the affairs of men; and, although the political aspect, which was then gloomy and menacing, has disappeared; and we have perceived in place of it a bright and auspicious prospect; yet no one can ascertain how long will be its continuance. No human foresight can reach to all future time; to no human being belongs the keen, intuitive faculty of exploring every momentous event, which may take place in the course of a long succession of periods yet to come. Indeed, sir, I should utter no calumny on human nature, were I to say that the book of futurity remains completely shut from the view of the most inquisitive, the most penetrating eye, until each leaf successively opens and discloses its contents. What are our pre-conceptions of the events of any period before they actually come to pass? What are they more than conjectures? What more than mere expectations that certain effects will be produced by certain causes, which we believe to be naturally adapted to the production of such effects? But how often are these expectations disappointed! Look into the volume of history, which records the transactions and the events of past times, and how frequently is it to be seen that one generation of men had experienced a state of things widely different from what had been expected by the preceding generation, and the very reverse of what the existing state of things in their time had seemed to promise them!

So long as man continues to be what he is, taken in a collective, national capacity, revolution of sentiment may be expected to attend him; and in the administration of his government, one uniform unvarying course of procedure is a phenomenon scarcely to be imagined—certainly, never yet experienced for any great length of time—unless, indeed, it is to be found in the gloomy recesses of despotism. In countries over which that species of government, or rather that abuse of all government, stretches its iron sceptre, and by establishing a perennial system of universal fear, maintains an absolute control over the public sentiment, the despot, who by his nod rules everything, may direct his proceedings in one uniform course. Nowhere else is such an uniformity of procedure to be found. In those devoted countries, the springs of human action are bound down so closely on all sides, that no room is left wherein to move themselves. An universal dread of the tyrant stupifies and hushes the whole nation into a state of dead, listless, quietism, and profound apathy; consequently, there cannot exist any external cause by which the tyrant can be influenced to vary his course, otherwise than according to his own will and humor. Yet, even in those unfortunate regions, the bandages of oppression are sometimes drawn so severely tight, and strained to such an excessive degree, that they are snapped, and afford a temporary relief to the wretched subjects. The springs of action for a moment recover a portion of their natural elasticity, and expand themselves so far, at least, as to produce a revolution in the Government. Scarcely ever is any other sort of revolution produced in those countries.

But in a free country, a country really free, where public opinion cannot be repressed, where public sentiment cannot, and should not be controlled, revolutions of that sentiment—as they will happen, more or less frequently, according to the ruling temper of the nation—influence the government, and occasion changes or alterations in the administration of it, without affecting the existence of the government at all.

There is, however, to the American people, a peculiar source of consolation in the rational and just principles of the system which they have been wise enough to establish. These principles serve as an elevated and luminous beacon, by looking to which, those who have direction of the vessel of State may easily and safely guide it amidst the rocks and shoals whereon so many have been wrecked. These principles enlighten the paths that lead to public happiness, and render them infinitely plainer, and more easily to be traced, than they are found to be on any other portion of the globe. This, then, is a great and singular advantage attending our admirable system—that the strictest adherence to its real principles, is the easiest and most direct way towards promoting the general interests, tranquillity, and happiness of the people. It may, perhaps, be laid down as a correct position, that the duration of public sentiment, in favor of public measures, will generally be commensurate with the time during which those measures are such as promote the general interest and happiness of the people. Since, then, of all systems in the world, the American system of government is the best calculated for an easy attainment of these objects, proportionably greater in this, than in any other system, is the probability that these objects will be pursued in the administration of it. Hence, also, in the same proportion, is the prospect that public sentiment will be less liable to fluctuation here, than under any other government where the public feelings are allowed to express themselves.

But, nevertheless, sir, is there an absolute certainty that the administrators of that system will be always invariably guided by its principles; or that, plain and direct as is the way that leads to public happiness, they will never pursue any other course? Is there an absolute certainty that every measure, of every set of men who shall hereafter succeed to the administration, will promote the general welfare in all respects, and be perfectly conformable to those rules of economy which are essential to the prosperity of a government like this, and equally essential to the general happiness of the American people? Can such an inference be clearly and undeniably drawn from correct views of human nature, or from a general experience of the political transactions of mankind? No sir! And, although from the principles of this system, and from the virtue of the American people, there is far better security for an easy attainment of every desirable object of civil government here, than anywhere else; yet this security is not completely infallible. It cannot be expected that no vicissitude in the political affairs of this country, that no revolution of public sentiment will hereafter take place. Already have we experienced an important change. Already have we experienced a change amounting to a complete revolution of sentiment, as to a great portion of the American people, and to a complete reversal of the prominent measures of administration. I have rejoiced, sir, and do rejoice in this change, as a grand amelioration of measures. I rejoice in the auspicious state of things which it has produced. I have trusted, I have believed, and I hope, that it rests on a basis which will render it durable; yet, I have no right to flatter myself it will always continue to be such. What has once happened, may happen again. What has been once done, may be done again, and may be expected to be done again whenever the same disposition shall exist in the agents, if the authority remains the same. The construction which has been given to the clause, I have read, in the cases alluded to, and under which construction, such a latitude of power has been assumed as may be given again to that clause; and the same, or even a greater latitude of power may be actually exercised under such construction, if the clause remains as it is. It is possible that we may feel the lash of another sedition act, or something more terrible, in its provisions. Indeed, sir, I wish there may be no reason to apprehend that the period may not be very far distant when we may experience a reflux, a sad reflux of things, and behold our political horizon again darkened and menacing.

That the clause I have read, should be liable to receive a construction so broad and extensive is, perhaps, not very much to be wondered at, when we consider the strong propensity existing in human nature to grasp at unwarrantable power; and when, indeed, frequent experience manifests too much inclination to adopt measures which appear expedient, without strictly examining whether such measures are authorized by the Constitution or not. There is something fascinating in the possession of power. When no limits are fixed to the exercise of it, everything within its reach is legalized according to the will of the possessor. This is, to him, the only standard of moral rectitude. In the scale of human actions, those which are forbidden by the eternal, indefensible laws of nature and of reason, are confounded with those which these laws admit. These laws, which should be universally obligatory on all in power, and all out of power, and which may be rightly called the great charter of the human race, are, by this arbiter, this will, so construed as to have no binding force at all. The suggestions of this arbiter decide the fitness of every act throughout the scale. By these, the life of a man and the life of an insect are often placed in the same degree of estimation. By the decisions of this tribunal, all principles are confounded, and everything is rendered lawful to the sovereign. As he wills any act, so it is to be done, as expedient to display his power and to maintain his dominion. Such is the case in despotic governments, and hence, sir, it should be deduced, as an incontrovertible maxim, that, in every government intended to be limited in its powers, it is essential clearly to define those powers. This is necessary in governments, the powers of which are designed to be much more general and extensive than those of the federal Government of these States. How important, then, is it, that the powers of this Government, limited as they are in so peculiar a manner, should be marked out with such clearness and precision, that those who administer the Government may not, at any time, without manifest and glaring violation of its essential principles, exercise any power not intended to be delegated to them! With a view to this object, I wish to submit this proposition, believing as I do, that under some general expressions, perhaps not sufficiently explicit—contained in the clause which I have read—a power has been exercised which was never intended to be vested in any department of this Government.

In submitting this proposition, sir, I solicit the indulgence and patience of the House, while I take a view of the nature, the powers, and genuine principles of the Federal Constitution, as I understand them to be; and of its relation to the States. In this view, I trust, those powers, those principles, and that relation, will be laid down not incompatibly with the general understanding of them by the American people. I believe I shall be strictly conformable to its essential principles when I say that this Constitution does not extend its authority to the utmost limits of civil jurisdiction—that it embraces not all the objects of civil rule or authority—that it does not give to this Government a right to exercise every species of power existing under the Governments of these American States, that it conveys not to it an authority to perform all the functions of sovereignty—that it restrains, it confines, it limits the authority of this Government to certain delineated objects—that it confers upon it certain particular powers, all which are distinctly enumerated and specified—that these powers, and these alone, it delegates to this Government—that it does not assume the broad and extensive principle that all powers are granted to this Government, which are not expressly reserved to the States or to the people of the States—that directly the contrary principle constitutes its very essence. This principle is, that all powers are reserved, which are not expressly granted to the Federal Government, or expressly prohibited to the States. So far from leaving the States, or the people of the States, in possession of no other powers or rights than those which are expressly reserved to them, this Constitution contains no express reservation at all, except in one single clause, which reserves to the States the right of appointing the officers of militia, and of training them according to the discipline prescribed by Congress. This, I conceive, was done, because such a right was deemed proper to be retained to the States, and inasmuch as it is a right incidental to that of providing for organizing and disciplining the militia, which is expressly granted to the Federal Government, as means of enabling it to command the force of the nation for the common defence of all the States; this right might be construed to pass over to the General Government along with the last mentioned power, were it not positively excluded from the grant. It were, indeed, entirely needless, unless it should be for the purpose of guarding against constructions no way compatible with the genius of the Government, to make any such reservation. For, sir, the specification of particular powers is itself an exclusion of all other powers—it is a positive limitation of the authority of this Government to those particular specified powers. This principle manifestly appears from the organization of this Constitution. From the plan, from the scope, from the nature, from the design of it, we may trace this principle too plainly and too distinctly to be mistaken. It is stamped on the face of the Constitution in bright and shining colors—it is engraved on it in characters too strong and too splendid to be misunderstood.

I have taken this view of the Constitution, because this great principle was co-existent with the Constitution itself, and because the tenth amendment, which declares that "the powers not delegated to the General Government, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people respectively," did not create this principle; but is only a recognition of it, which has been deemed proper to be inserted, lest a spirit of innovation, indulging itself in regions of wild, fanciful, extravagant theory, might give a construction as to the quantum of powers delegated to the Federal Government by the Constitution, and as to the powers retained to the States, totally incompatible with the universal understanding of the American people thereon at the time of its adoption.

Why, sir, did the framers of this Constitution so nicely construct its material parts? Why was it drawn with such precision, such exactness in the limitation of its powers, and on such peculiar principles? For this very manifest and important reason—that as little danger as possible might result from constructive interpretation—to guard it in the most effectual manner discernable by human foresight against such constructions as would give to it a consolidating tendency. But every act of the Federal Legislature, which invades the independence of the States, whether it assumes jurisdiction over objects of the greatest importance, or whether it assumes jurisdiction over objects of small consequence, will have that tendency; inasmuch as both of these descriptions of acts are bottomed on the same destructive principle—both gravitate towards the same centre—both have a direct tendency to destroy the State institutions. The difference between them consists merely in the degree of rapidity with which that work of destruction would be wrought by measures of the first description, and the degree of rapidity with which it would be compassed by those of the latter description. A bold and gigantic stride of usurpation might at once totter the State fabrics to their very bases, and soon level them with the face of the earth; whereas, encroachments commencing in smaller violations of State authority, and progressing step by step, would gradually and almost imperceptibly undermine and loosen their foundation. The operation in such instances, although it would be slower, yet perhaps, might not be the less sure of finally producing their total destruction. Indeed, sir, every act, which assumes a power not granted, is a step towards consolidation. It wrests from the State Governments a portion of that residuum of authority which remained to them when the Constitution was adopted. Such encroachments cannot be made without extreme danger. For one assumption always furnishes a precedent for another assumption; this again becomes ground for further infringements on State authority; thence ensues a regular progression of encroachment after encroachment, until at length the States are stripped of every species of authority, which can deserve the name of Government. All these acts of Federal usurpation, while they are drawing into its vortex this great accession of power, are weaving around the State institutions the web of destruction. Although dreadful may be the struggle—dreadful may be the scenes exhibited on the theatre of the American world before this will be entirely drawn over the States—yet, sir, it may be done. After a continued series of such encroachments on their rights and authorities, from the state of insignificancy into which they will then be sunk, they may be permitted to merge into the general mass. As institutions no longer worth the expenses requisite for their maintenance—as of too little consequence to merit any further support, they may be given up, suffered to lose all their energy, and at length their very existence, as waves, which appear for a while on the surface of the ocean, subside into its immense bosom, and disappear entirely.

Should this melancholy state of things ever arise, what will be its ultimate issue Heaven only knows. Whether this great and flourishing country, which, at this time, sheds its glories far, very far, beyond the limits of its own territories, will then continue to be the fair nursery of liberty, or whether it will become the frightful seat of political slavery; whether, indeed, the very great, the beloved, the inestimable principle of representation itself, the discovery of which has been of infinitely more importance to the political world than the art of navigation has been to the commercial world—of infinitely more importance than any art ever was to the human kind—a principle without which, under whatever form a Government may exist, it is impossible that liberty should exist, except it be in a perfect democracy; every idea of whose existence under any other Government destitute of that principle is perfectly chimerical; every such Government, be its structure whatever it may, which pretends to maintain its existence, verily indeed exhibits one of the merest farces that ever appeared amongst the scenes of any political drama; whether, I say, this all-important principle will then continue to actuate the Government of this country, or whether it will cease to maintain its just empire, lose its energy, and even at length be spurned from the American shores, in order to make way for the introduction of a monstrous system, which reverses the natural order of things—transfers the sovereignty from the people, who alone are the natural, who alone can be the legitimate possessors of it—places it in the hands of an individual—fixes a diadem on his head; and that bauble, according to the principle then brought into operation, communicates to him the whole majesty of the nation, which is transmitted as an inheritance through his family from generation to generation, whether the heir, on whom the inheritance should devolve at any time, be a knave or a fool; and by the history of mankind it is shown to us that very often these possessors of the sovereignty of nations completely unite in their own persons both of these characters. Sir, what appellation shall I give to a system like this? A system as truly preposterous in its nature as it is tortuous and wrongful in its operation; but to which, nevertheless, a vast portion of the human race have been blindly devoted from the earliest ages of society down to the present day. That very circumstance, however, contributes not a little to the appreciation of the American system. That it has been the peculiar felicity of the American people to understand their own rights—to institute governments better adapted to the important purpose of securing to themselves a permanent enjoyment of those rights than nations of the old world ever have done; and, moreover, to derive additional benefits from the happy combination of a Federal Government with those of the particular States, are all circumstances which eminently characterize this system, and distinguish it from every other political establishment. While, far from rejoicing, we deeply lament that the ancient darkness which had bound the world in chains for more than forty centuries, still covers an immense portion of the globe, where everything exists under the gloomy reign of despotism; the republican principle, maintained in its genuine spirit, like a rich gem placed in the midst of a rude collection of worthless things, must shine with augmented brilliancy, when viewed in contrast with so many horrible systems containing not a single trait which resembles the faintest outlines of liberty—not one of its dimmest features—but exhibiting on every side vast multitudes in all the variety of wretchedness, who never tasted of any other than the bitter cup of slavery!

Oh! sir, how supremely valuable ought our happy institutions to be esteemed! What ardent zeal should animate our efforts to preserve them unimpaired—to cherish and cultivate their vital principles in their original purity and perfection—to transmit them down to posterity untainted by corruption, unassailed by violence!

Sir, while I express these sentiments, under a full persuasion that I shall not be contradicted as to their propriety, I cannot but believe that I may also affirm, without fear of being refuted in opinion by many, that, amongst the excellencies of the Federal Government, there is none more important—there is none more valuable, than its limited character as it respects the State authorities. Vested with powers duly proportioned to its own proper objects only, which are of a general nature, and alike regard all the States, it leaves them in full possession of their own sovereignty; while, on the other hand, amongst the powers surrendered up by the States to this Government, there are very few but such as, if exercised by either of the States individually, might materially affect the interests, and in some instances endanger the safety of the other States. Thus each individual State participates in the benefits resulting from the united and combined energies of the whole; while it retains the right of sovereignty, and all the powers requisite for a complete administration of its own affairs. Here, then, is the true character of the Federal Government. The powers properly appertaining to it are limited to those which are purely of a federative nature, and to such as the States by this compact have consented to yield up to it for the common benefits of the Union. The former could not be communicated to, nor be exercised by, either of the States individually, without destroying the independence of the others. The latter, if not thus yielded up, might be exercised by any of them to the detriment of the rest. Thus it is that each particular State, by consenting to yield up to the Union those powers, and those alone, the retention of which might be injurious, provides for itself a security against injuries by the same act which divests itself of the power to injure either of its sister States; while the Federal Government derives from this cession no manner of right to trench upon those powers which have been deemed proper to be retained to the States—no manner of right to diminish their sovereignty as distinct independent States.

What is the relation, therefore, which subsists between this Federal Government and those of the particular States? If its true character be such, as has been stated, (and this, I think, will not be denied, or, if denied, I would challenge the most subtle genius who ascribes to it more extensive powers, to support such a position without utterly demolishing the fundamental principles of the Confederacy) this Government cannot justly claim to itself the supremacy of a paramount government with a right to restrain and control the States in the exercise of their own legitimate powers; those powers which remained to them when the Constitution was adopted. To exercise such an authority over them would be to destroy their independence; totally to annihilate their sovereignty as States. For one sovereignty cannot exist under the dominion of another sovereignty. The subjection of one power to the control of another power, another separate overruling authority, supposes a state of subordination in the former power, and that all supremacy resides in the latter. Should it be imagined, therefore, by any one that such a sort of power over the States exists in this Government, and that, nevertheless, they retain any portion of their original sovereignty, of a more complete absurdity it is not within the compass of the human intellect to conceive. It is, then, unquestionable that either this Goverernment possess no manner of control over the States, as such, or the States possess no manner of sovereignty as States; but that they do possess ample rights of sovereignty, I believe will not be denied by any one. It follows then, of course, that any attempt in this Government to exercise such controlling authority over them, would be an attempt to destroy, and the actual exercise of such authority would actually destroy their sovereignty as States. So also, the assumption of any powers properly appertaining to the States, and not granted to this Government, is an invasion of their sovereignty. A series of such invasions in progression must have a fatal tendency to produce the same effect, as a general controlling authority; and must ultimately operate a destruction of the State institutions. In what relation, therefore, to each other and to the Federal Government, which connects them together, can we view the members of this grand Confederacy, but in that of so many distinct independent communities? In this relation they all stand, as well to the Federal Government as to each other. In this relation alone can they be justly viewed. They are not only distinct from, and independent of, each other, though connected together in this Confederacy: equally are they distinct from, and independent of, this General Government, though connected together by it. To cement this connexion between them, as so many distinct, independent communities, was indeed the original and primary object of this Government. From such connexion between independent States retaining their distinct separate governments, it has been rightly judged by the people of these States, that greater benefits might result to each and to all of them, than could be expected without any connexion at all—greater, too, than could be expected to flow from any connexion founded on different principles. Hence arose the institution of the present system of Government. A system analogous to which the annals of man, either ancient or modern, scarcely presents us with the smallest traces of any other. Such, then, being a leading principle of this Government, and the objects of it being special or particular, as before observed, its limited character, as it respects the State authorities, must necessarily be one of its principal distinguishing properties, otherwise it would not be conformable to that principle. It is essential to the prosperity of the Union that this character be preserved—it is essential to the happiness of the American people. Let not this Government, therefore, assume to itself any power, in the exercise of which this character will be changed—the true relation between this and the State Governments will be entirely destroyed. Let not this Government, proud in the contemplation that the arm of its authority extends over this great continent, disregard State rights, and take upon itself the exercise of powers which the Constitution has withheld, wisely withheld from it, and retained in other hands. Let it not forget its own true character; but always recollect that, although its authority extends to all the United States generally, yet it is not a general authority, but an authority special, and limited to particular objects. It should ever be remembered, also, that, between this Government and the States, mutual and reciprocal duties and obligations have arisen from the compact, by which this Government was established. It is no less incumbent on the Federal Government to confine itself within the sphere of its own appropriate powers, than it is incumbent on the States not to attempt the resumption of any of the powers which they have surrendered up to this Government. The States are bound by the cessions they have made, and the Federal Government is bound to claim no more nor greater powers than those which have been ceded and granted to it. It is the duty of this Government to regulate its proceedings according to the measure of powers assigned to it under the Constitution; and it is the duty of the States to direct their operations to those objects only which peculiarly belong to them as distinct communities; equally is it the duty of each to move in its own Constitutional orbit. If either of them wanders from this course, the harmony of the whole system will be interrupted; and such interruptions must have a tendency to defeat the principal ends of its institution. I do not imagine, however, there is ground for apprehension that either of the States will attempt to invade the authority of this Government, or to resume any of the powers which they have surrendered up to it. This opinion, I think, will appear to be a rational one, when we consider the nature of the powers vested in the General Government—that they are of two descriptions, (as before observed,) some of them being of a nature purely federative, which never did appertain to the States, and cannot be exercised by either of them in its individual capacity; when we consider those of the other description, which originally did appertain to the States, and have by them been surrendered up to this Government; when we consider that the inducements to make the surrender arose from a conviction that the safety of each particular State was involved in the establishment of a firm union and connexion between all of them; that, to insure the attainment of this object, it was necessary to vest the Federal Government with those particular powers, thereby enabling it to combine the general interests of all the States as a means of cementing this political connexion between them, which otherwise could not be expected to be of any long duration. To suppose, therefore, that either of the States will attempt to make encroachments on the known established powers of the Federal Government, thus solemnly assigned to it under the Constitution, would be to suppose the existence of a very great degree of capriciousness in that State. Extreme, indeed, would be its folly and rashness in thus arraying itself against the Union; by endeavoring to repossess itself of powers so solemnly granted to this Government, with its own consent, and that of the other States, for the great purpose of securing its independence, and of promoting those general interests which appertain to itself, in common with all the other States. Scarcely can it be presumable that such a step, the evident tendency of which would be to contravene these purposes, will ever be taken by either of the States. Nor should it be presumed that the Federal Government will pursue an eligible course for effecting these purposes, by endeavoring to enlarge the sphere of its own powers, and to contract those of the States. The powers assigned to it under the Constitution are amply sufficient for all these purposes; and mistaken, indeed, is that zeal for the Federal Government, which would stretch its authority or extend its operations beyond its Constitutional limits; for there exists in the American people a jealousy for State rights and authorities. There is, sir, a jealousy, strong and vigilant—a jealousy which will take the alarm whenever these rights or authorities are invaded; in proportion to the extent of such invasion, it will be impassioned: and the dissatisfactions, which may be apprehended from such a state of public agitation, cannot be desirable to any real friend of the Union.

Sir, this jealousy is not merely attentive to the preservation of the existing State authorities from unconstitutional encroachments by the General Government; it is also averse to any Constitutional diminution of those authorities. It considers the powers already vested in the Federal Government, as fully adequate to all the purposes of its institution. I confess, sir, I am one of those who entertain this sort of jealousy; who have no wish that a single item should be added to the catalogue of powers already vested in the Federal Government; who believe that such a step would be dangerous; that the process, once commenced, might lead to more and more grants, until all real, efficient power would be accumulated together in the hands of the Federal Government, and the States be rendered perfectly contemptible. I confess, too, that I feel no satisfaction in seeing a committee raised on the idea of an addition to the existing powers of the Federal Government; and whatever may have occasioned this step, I cannot refrain from expressing my repugnance to it; on the contrary, I am induced by it to bring forward this proposition thus early in the session, and to declare these sentiments on the occasion.

Important, sir, was the epoch when this Constitution was proposed to the people of the several States for their consideration and adoption, if approved of. The world never witnessed a more august scene than what America then exhibited. Thirteen free and independent States engaged in the solemn act of deliberating on a system of General Government, which should draw around them a band of political union; which should render this a firm and durable band, and yet so as not to impair the individual sovereignty of the States, presented indeed a sublime spectacle. To investigate the principles of a system so new, so unprecedented, so peculiar in its nature, the strongest energies of the American mind were brought into action. It was an object of the most anxious inquiry whether this system, by providing, in the manner it does, for the great purposes of the Union, to which the then existing Confederation had been found inadequate, would not impair and ultimately destroy the sovereignty of the individual States. While the imbecility and inefficacy of that Confederation became a theme of universal lamentation, and produced a general wish that the ties of union between the States might be strengthened, every American heart felt itself deeply interested in preserving the State authorities; every heart glowed with ardor for the perpetuation of that species of political institution under which the people of the several States had maintained their civil polity during their arduous contest for independence. This great, this unprecedented act of sovereignty, therefore, which gave existence to this system, was not performed without a pause—solemn pause—an awful apprehension that possibly the powers to be delegated to the Federal Government by the proposed Convention, might have a tendency to shake the foundation of the State governments, and finally produce a consolidation of all the States into one extended empire. Hope and fear alternately affected the public mind during this important crisis; hope that the system would operate the desired effect for the joint benefit of the Union and of the States; fear that it might absorb all State authority, and eventually defeat the best ends of its institution. Its peculiar organization, its leading essential attributes, cautiously examined, deliberately and solemnly traced, recommended its adoption. From its structure and its principles arose the prospect of its utlity, and on these the American people rested their hopes that the system would promote the general interests of the Union without abridging the independence or sovereignty of the States. May these hopes never be disappointed; may they be constantly realized!

That jealous affection for State rights and authorities, which I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, has always existed. It is coeval in existence with the States themselves. It is a laudable jealousy. It is founded in reason and in nature. It is a jealousy resulting from fixed attachment to a great and acknowledged principle. That small Republics are most propitious to liberty, better adapted for its preservation, at the same time that greater security for good order in society is afforded than in those which govern the inhabitants of very extensive territories, is an impressive maxim, strongly inculcated on the American mind. The people of the several States, therefore, see in their State governments safe depositories of their civil rights and immunities; strong barriers against licentious interruptions of social order; convenient and easy modes of administering justice among themselves, and, indeed, of managing all their local affairs. Hence their fond, their invincible attachment to that species of government. Hence that jealous sensibility, which will ever be alarmed when this Government makes any encroachment on their rights or authorities. Hence, too, those struggles, those melancholy scenes, which may be apprehended before the people of the several States would submit to a dissolution of the State institutions, or acquiesce in a series of measures tending to deprive them of their appropriate powers, should so fatal a policy ever direct the councils of the Union. Should as fatal a policy ever direct the councils of the Union, did I say? Would to God that such a sort of policy had not already mingled with its councils. Could not such a sort of policy be traced in the doctrine deduced from the last clause in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution (which I have read,) when by the construction given to that clause in the cases which have been alluded to, it was contended that the Federal Legislature possessed a right to pass any laws whatsoever, which they should deem expedient for carrying into execution the powers enumerated in that section, and all other powers vested in any department or officer of the Government, whether such laws should have any sort of relation to, or any manner of connexion with any of these powers, or not? Such, sir, was the construction given to that clause in those cases—a construction involving a principle of the utmost latitude admissible in a government of the most unlimited extent of jurisdiction. Admit this principle, sir, admit that the Congress should possess such a latitude of power, and what then would remain to the States? Would there be left to them any real, substantial power? No, sir. All might be grasped by the General Government. The plea of necessity and expediency might be extended to any lengths whatsoever, and applied to every possible subject of legislation; while nothing but the name, and hardly the name, of any power would remain to the States. Sir, can a construction, which expands the federal jurisdiction to such an amazing extent, be reconcilable to the true principles of the Confederacy? Can a construction thus transforming the Federal Government from a system of limited special powers into that sort which exercises every species of civil and political authority, be reconcilable to those principles? Sir, it would be the very height of absurdity to say that such contrarieties could be reconcilable; and should such construction of the clause I have mentioned, become the established construction of it, not a trace of those federal principles would be left. The States would become States in name only, and all the properties of a consolidated Government would spring into existence.

Many, sir, and truly deserved, are the eulogiums which have been bestowed upon the Federal Government. Beautiful is its structure; admirable are its component parts; justly may it be likened in its symmetry to whatever partakes of wisdom, to whatever is excellent in the contrivances of man; and if, among other objects of admiration to which it may be rightly compared, it may be said that this Government and those of the particular States, taken in conjunction, form a system in the political hemisphere not unlike that which in the natural hemisphere is exhibited by a grand primary planet, and its surrounding satellites; this comparison should nevertheless be drawn with some exception. For these States do not, like those satellites, shine with borrowed, reflected light, emanating from a great central planet. No, sir, they display a radiance solely their own. Their splendors issue from their own bodies. They are so many original sources of light and heat to the spheres within which they respectively act, illuminating and vivifying every thing therein; whilst the Federal Government by its influences duly dispensed unites the members of this constellation together in harmonious intercourse, and produces to the system the benefits of their collective energies. But suppose the Federal Government should extinguish the essence of the individual members to make up one entire body, it cannot impart their natural qualities to that single immense body. Their light, their heat—the glories, the excellencies of the whole system, I fear, would be forever gone! Indeed, sir, to my mind the very idea of consolidation is truly terrible; and should I be so unhappy as ever to see the time arrive when State institutions shall be done away, or when their energies shall be lost, I should expect soon afterwards to behold the dawn of that melancholy day, which in its meridian will blast the liberties of America, whose evening will close perhaps with their utter and eternal destruction, and be succeeded by a long, a dreaty, a dismal, a tremeadous night of despotism. I pray God that such a dreadful day may never be permitted to dawn!—that the American people, true to the memorable and glorious principles for which they fought, for which they bled, for which their fathers, their brothers died, may ever cherish, cultivate, and guard them, as well against the secret approaches of corruption as against the open assaults of violence, and effectually guard them against both!—that the arm of usurpation may never reach the State institutions, so essential to the preservation of American liberty!—that co-extensively with the duration of time itself, such institutions may continue to exist, retaining their full portion of energy in this grand and beautiful system; howsoever other systems, founded in erroneous principles, may shrink before the flame of ambition, or be shaken down by the storms of party; howsoever those which have arisen on the ruins of liberty may in their turn be subjected to other changes—howsoever they may experience a train of vicissitudes in the fluctuating course of human affairs.

Much, indeed, sir, might be said in favor of this system of Federal Government, as far surpassing anything of the sort which has ever yet appeared amongst the productions of men; but, being a production of men, it cannot be completely perfect. Admirable as it is, it is a system of experiment; and it is from experiment that its defects are to be discovered. Whenever, therefore, any defect is discovered, which threatens to be of dangerous tendency, I think it behooves this nation, as far as practicable, to amend the defective part. I will trouble the House with no further remarks, however, upon this subject at present; but with their permission will submit this proposition, as an effort towards bringing about an amendment to that clause in the Constitution, which I have read, being thoroughly impressed with the belief that it is materially defective.

I am sensible, sir of the great difficulty of framing a clause, which may effectually guard at all times against improper construction; and therefore cannot have full confidence that the one about to be submitted is such: yet in the proposition the subject will be introduced to the notice of the House, and if the object of it should be deemed expedient, I have no doubt but that one may be framed so as to answer the important purpose. The proposition which, with leave of the House, I shall have the honor to submit, is in the following words:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, which when ratified and confirmed by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the said States, shall be valid and binding as a part of the Constitution of the United States.

The last clause of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution which contains the following words: "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof," shall be construed so as to comprehend only such laws as shall have a natural connexion with and immediate relation to the powers enumerated in the said section, or to such other powers as are expressly vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

The House immediately considered the said amendment, and referred it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Friday, December 12.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Pennsylvania, accompanying the copy of a letter from Michael Leib, Esquire, containing his resignation of a seat in this House, as one of the members for the said State; also, a copy of the Governor's writ of election to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby, and a duplicate return of the election of John Porter, to serve in this House, as a Representative for the said State of Pennsylvania, in the room of the said Michael Leib; which were read, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

The Speaker stated to the House that he had received information from the Clerk of the Public Buildings that he was ready to proceed in securing the ceiling of the Chamber of the House.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

On motion of Mr. Bidwell, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to revive and make permanent "An act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States and to compel the attendance of witnesses," and in addition to the same.

Mr. J. Clay remarked that in all the contested elections which had been conducted by ballot, a considerable difficulty had arisen in ascertaining from which of the candidates the votes given by unqualified persons should be deducted. For the purpose of removing, or at least lessening of difficulty, he had draughted a new section, which he purposed to submit for consideration. The objection heretofore made to examining the votes, to determine for which candidate they had been given, had been founded on the opinion that it interfered with the sacredness of the ballot. This, if a sound objection, could only apply to persons legally qualified to vote, as a principle fitted to save the rights of electors, and not of persons not legally qualified to vote. Mr. C. said his object was to authorize a magistrate to examine on oath persons who had voted without being qualified for whom they had voted; that votes thus given might be deducted from the candidate for whom they were given. This would obviate much of the difficulty at present existing. Intending to offer such a provision, he moved that the Committee should rise and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Bidwell observed that the principle of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a new one, that they should undertake to decide by law what votes shall not be examined. It appeared to him useless, as it was settled by the Constitution, and unless Constitutional evidence was given to the House of the existence of unqualified votes, this provision would abridge its Constitutional power. A decision on the qualification of electors was expressly vested by the Constitution in the House. It, therefore, appeared to him improper by statute to decide this point, which was the proper province of the House. A provision of that kind would go to put a construction by statute on the meaning of the Constitution, or to interfere with the Constitutional powers vested in the House. Such being his present sentiments he felt a repugance to the proposition.

Mr. J. Clay said it was true that they could not by law decide what were the qualifications of Electors. But he would ask, if in cases of voting viva voce, where the votes given for a particular candidate were proved not to be good, they were not deducted from him? His object was that the same process should be pursued where the election was by ballot. They had unquestionably a right to say that a man who votes, without being entitled, shall say for whom he voted. Such a provision would not be putting a construction on the Constitution not at present attached to it. It would only require those not entitled to vote to declare on oath for whom they had voted.

Mr. Smilie said he had no objection to the Committee rising for the purpose of more fully considering the subject. He recollected that in the State in which he lived this point had often been discussed. Where votes were given viva voce there was no difficulty. But where ballots were received, they could not compel the voter to say for whom he voted. He agreed with his colleague, that it would be no violation of principle to compel the unqualified voter to say on oath for whom he voted. The principle was so plain, it could not be denied. He hoped, however, that the Committee would rise, that his colleague might be enabled to bring forward his proposition.

Mr. Bidwell said he was not disposed to precipitate a decision. He had, therefore, no objection to the Committee rising, that gentlemen might mature their ideas on the subject. He would, however, observe that he considered the proposition objectionable in one point of view, as giving a magistrate the right of determining who were qualified voters; a point only to be decided by the House.

Mr. J. Clay observed that before the question was taken he would suggest the propriety of recommitting the bill, either, to a select committee or to the Committee of Elections, to determine the propriety of his amendment, where the subject might be canvassed, and the amendment so modified as to be unexceptionable. He hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts, who had brought in the bill, would make this motion.

The question was then taken on the rising of the Committee, and carried without a division; when the Committee rose and obtained leave to sit again.

PETITIONS REFERRED.

Mr. Holmes moved that the Committee of Claims should be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Arnold Martin, and Sarah his wife, William Kincaid, John Hargisheimer, Philip Turner, and Ludwig Kuhn, all barred by the statute of limitations, and that they should be referred to the committee appointed to consider what provision should be made for such claims; to which motion the House agreed.

Mr. J. Randolph observed that, during the last session, several petitions from persons engaged in the collection of the public revenue, praying for an increase of emolument, had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means—likewise the report of the Secretary of the Treasury; and that the committee, under the instructions of the House, as well as from the general powers delegated to them, had taken up the subject in a general point of view, in order to modify the existing system, as circumstances required. The subject had required much attention, and after a schedule had been made out, it by some means got mislaid. Mr. R. concluded by moving that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the petitions, should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, which motion was agreed to.

Monday, December 15.

Two other members, to wit: George Clinton, junior, from New York, and William Dickson, from Tennessee, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to suspend the operation of an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise,' and to remit the penalties incurred under the same," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House having agreed to consider the amendments,

Mr. J. Randolph moved to refer them to a select committee.

Mr. Alston opposed the motion. He believed no reference necessary, as the subject was too plain to require any detailed investigation; if it should be referred, he would prefer a reference to a Committee of the whole House, and, accordingly, made a motion to that effect.

Mr. J. Clay supported the motion of Mr. Randolph; and stated that the object of the reference was merely to introduce a provision to secure the payment of costs by those who had incurred the penalties of the non-importation act, which otherwise would be chargeable to the United States.

Mr. Smilie opposed the reference to a select committee, and declared himself under existing circumstances, hostile to the amendment of the Senate, vesting the President with a suspending power.

The motion of reference to a Committee of the whole House having been disagreed to, ayes 30, the reference to a select committee obtained without a division.

The committee are Messrs. J. Randolph, J. Clay, and Alston.

Mr. Early, from the committee appointed, on the third instant, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to prohibition of the slave trade, presented, according to order, a bill to prohibit the importation or bringing of slaves into the United States, or the Territories thereof, after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a report of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, stating the progress made on them during the last season, and what is proposed for the ensuing one.

I took every measure within my power for carrying into effect the request of the House of Representatives, of the seventeenth of April last, to cause the south wing of the Capitol to be prepared for their accommodation by the commencement of the present session. With great regret, I found it was not to be accomplished. The quantity of freestone necessary, with the size and quality of many of the blocks, was represented as beyond what could be obtained from the quarries by any exertions which could be commanded. The other parts of the work, which might all have been completed in time, were necessarily retarded by the insufficient progress of the stone work.

TH. JEFFERSON.

December 15, 1806.

The Message was read, and, together with the papers, ordered to lie on the table.

COAST SURVEY.

Mr. Dana, of Connecticut.—In 1802, an act was passed, authorizing a survey of Long Island Sound. In pursuance of that act, the Secretary of the Treasury caused a survey to be taken by two men, who appear to have been, what the act intended, intelligent and proper persons. And there has since been published a chart of the Sound, handsomely executed, on a large scale, which must, I presume, be regarded as convenient and valuable by those concerned in that branch of navigation.

At the last session of Congress, an act was passed for another survey. It made provision for surveying the coast of North Carolina between Cape Hatteras and Cape Fear, with the shoals lying off or between those capes. I understand that measures have been taken for executing this act, but that the vessel employed in the service, and all the papers respecting the survey which had been made, had been lost near Ocracoke Inlet, in one of the desolating storms experienced on the coast in the course of the present year.

The surveys, which have thus been authorized, were perhaps of the most urgent necessity; but other surveys of the coast are desirable. What has already been done may be regarded as introductory to a general survey of the coasts of the United States under authority of the Government. With a correct chart of every part of the coast, our seamen would no longer be under the necessity of relying on the imperfect or erroneous accounts given of our coast by foreign navigators. I hope the lives of our seamen, the interest of our merchants, and the benefits to the revenue, will be regarded as affording ample compensation for making a complete survey of the coasts of the United States at the public expense.

The information which may be obtained will also be useful in designating portions of territorial sea to be regarded as the maritime precincts of the United States, within which, of course, the navigation ought to be free from the belligerent searches and seizures.

It is proposed to extend the survey to the distance of twenty leagues from the shore. This distance is mentioned with a view to the second article of the treaty with Great Britain in 1783, which describes our boundaries as "comprehending all islands within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States."

The resolution, which I propose for the consideration of the House, is expressed in these words:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for a survey of the coasts of the United States, designating the several islands, with the shoals and roads or places of anchorage within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States.

Mr. Crowninshield, of Massachusetts, was very glad to see the resolution offered, but he should like it better if it were more extensive. He believed there were many shoals on the coast lying at more than twenty leagues distance from the shore. Among others, St. George's Bank was at more than this distance. He wished that the resolution might be varied so as to comprehend all the shoals on the coast, from St. Croix to the southern extreme of Louisiana.

Mr. C. had always thought it important that an accurate survey should be made of our coast. Holland's chart, though the best, is very inaccurate.

Mr. Dana accorded with the chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures (Mr. Crowninshield) in respect to the utility of an accurate survey of the shoal which he had mentioned, but was against altering the resolution so as to include any islands at a greater distance than twenty leagues from the shore. The treaty of 1773 authorizes us to consider islands within that distance as appertaining to the territory of the United States. There is, therefore, peculiar propriety in extending the proposed survey to the distance of twenty leagues along the whole of our coast. If any shoals at a greater distance from shore are to be surveyed, special provision for this purpose may be made in the details of a bill which the committee may report. It would be more convenient to specify the details in a bill than in a general resolution for inquiry.

Mr. Crowninshield then moved to strike out twenty and insert fifty in the resolution. He was confident that there were shoals lying more than twenty leagues distant from the shore, and he thought it important to have them surveyed. It might be that there are no islands beyond that distance. He was not certain in regard to them, but he was sure that there were extensive shoals.

Mr. Dana suggested that the gentleman (Mr. Crowninshield) might designate, by way of amendment, particular shoals which he wished to be surveyed.

Mr. Cook, of Massachusetts, doubted whether all of St. George's Bank was within even fifty leagues of the shore. If it were in order, he would move to strike out twenty and insert seventy.

A division of the question on striking out twenty and inserting fifty was called for.

Mr. Crowninshield at length withdrew his motion, and it was agreed that the resolution should lie on the table.

NON-IMPORTATION ACT.

Mr. J. Randolph, from the committee to whom had been referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill to suspend the non-importation act, made a report, viz:

To agree to the first amendment proposed by the Senate, which is to strike out the following words at the end of the section, "This act shall take effect from and after the passing thereof"—with an amendment, viz: to add after the word "remit," as follows: "on payment by the parties by whom such penalty, fine, or forfeiture, may have been incurred, of all costs which have accrued, or may accrue before notice of this act shall have been received by the attorneys of the several districts of the United States."

And to agree to the second amendment, authorizing the President to suspend the non-importation act till the 31st of December.

A concurrence with the first amendment was carried without a division.

Mr. Dawson moved to amend the amendment of the Senate by substituting the words "public interest," in lieu of the words "public service."

Mr. J. Randolph said he did not see how the public interest could be disconnected from the public service.

Mr. Dawson's motion was agreed to—ayes 43, noes 40.

Mr. Smilie said he was against the amendment offered by the Senate. He hoped that gentlemen who proposed concurring in it would show its necessity at this time. The Message of the President had recommended a short suspension of the non-importation act, which had been done by the act passed by the House. If at a late period of the session, circumstances should justify the vesting a suspending power in the President, he might, perhaps, have no objection to the measure; but was there at this time any such necessity, when the probability was that the House would not rise until the 3rd of March; and when it could not be known whether important information might not previously reach them? If no necessity can be shown, why now legislate? He was also opposed to the amendment, because it looked like holding out to England that we were tired of the non-importation act. For these reasons he hoped the amendment would not be agreed to.

Mr. J. Clay said, he did not know that the operation of the amendment proposed by the Senate would be to show Great Britain that we were tired of the act. On the contrary, by making its further suspension conditional, it would show that unless further arrangements were made between the two Governments it would be carried into effect. It was very true, that further information might be received during the session, which might render a repeal of the act proper. But suppose an accommodation should take place between the two Governments between the close of the present session and the commencement of the next—still, notwithstanding this, the law in question must go into force on the 1st July, although every pretext for it was done away. Mr. C. said he was not very fond of placing this discretionary power in the hands of the President. But he did not perceive any other way in which the views of Congress could be accomplished. He was, therefore, reduced to the dilemma, either of giving the President power to suspend the act, or of suffering a measure confessedly hostile, to go into effect after a satisfactory adjustment of differences. The arguments in favor of the passage of the act were that it would induce Great Britain to suspend her depredations, and to recede from her injurious doctrines. If she abandoned these, and made reparation for her depredations, he apprehended all necessity for the continuance of the act would be done away. Why then continue it after the occurrence of these circumstances? If, however, the gentleman from Pennsylvania would point out any other less exceptionable mode, by which the views of the House could be effected, he would adopt it in preference to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. Crowninshield remarked that, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Smilie,) he could not give his sanction to the proposed amendment. He saw no necessity at this time for authorizing the President of the United States further to suspend the non-importation act. What had the House done? A few days since they had sent a bill to the Senate to suspend the act until the first of July. They had received from that body an amendment further to suspend it until December; and on what grounds? They had received no additional communications from the President. The House, then, to be consistent, ought to pursue the same course they had followed a few days since. Mr. C. said he then voted against a suspension of the non-importation act to the 1st of December. He considered the proposition under consideration as nearly the same thing; the principle of both was similar. He did not know that he should object to passing a bill late in the session, empowering the President to suspend the act, provided the negotiations were in such a situation as to promise a satisfactory issue; but he saw no necessity for precipitation. The bill would do as well without the amendment as with it. He should therefore vote against it.

A motion was here made to adjourn, in favor of which only four members rose.

Mr. Bidwell said he did not view the subject in the same light, in which it was seen by his colleague near him, (Mr. Crowninshield,) To him there appeared to be a material difference between the amendment of the Senate, now under consideration, and the proposition which had been negatived by the House, when the bill was before under discussion. The one was an absolute suspension of the act until next December; whereas the other was only the provision of a power to suspend it, if an occasion for such further suspension should occur, when Congress should not be in session. To the former he thought there were objections, which did not lie against the latter.

He could not agree to the observation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. J. Clay,) that the prohibitory act is confessedly a measure of hostility. On the contrary, he thought it a pacific measure. It was no more than a system of commercial regulation, which, consistently with the established laws and usages of nations, we have an undoubted right to adopt. It did no injury, and could give no just occasion of offence. It was indeed intended to press upon Great Britain. One principal object of it was to convince that Government and nation, that we have the power and the determination, by granting or withholding our market for their manufactures, by peaceable means, to make it their interest to do us justice, and be on good terms with us. This was not a hostile but a pacific and lawful policy.

He observed that when the bill was before the House on a former day, he had taken the liberty to express an opinion that the event of a treaty, intervening before another session of Congress, might be provided for by a separate section in this bill, or by a separate act, to be passed, if necessary, before the close of the present session. He had preferred the latter; but the reasons for that preference were not so strong as to induce him to dissent from the course which the Senate had thought proper to pursue.

He was generally not in favor of vesting discretionary powers in the Executive. But in the present case, where the principle was contained in the law, the discretion was so limited in its object and duration, and the rule for the exercise of that discretion was so obvious, he thought the authority could not be dangerous, and the objection was not applicable.

There was, he said, one strong consideration in favor of the section. If a treaty should be made, during the recess of Congress, or at so late a date as not to be known here until Congress should have adjourned, one of three courses must be adopted; either the prohibition must be suffered to operate from the first of July until December, which, in case of a satisfactory arrangement, would not be desirable, or Congress must be convened to provide for such a state of things, which might be very inconvenient; or the Executive must suspend the operation of the law until the next ordinary session of the Legislature. The latter course appeared to him to be attended with the least evil. He was, therefore, in favor of providing such an authority; and, as the Senate had judged it most expedient to insert it in this bill, although he should individually have preferred a separate and future bill for the purpose, he would not refuse to concur in the amendment.

Mr. Smilie said, he had but a single additional observation to offer; after making which, he would confine himself to giving his negative to the amendment. He had ever held it to be his duty not to grant legislative power to the Executive but in cases of necessity. If such a necessity could be shown to exist at present, he would consider whether it were proper to grant the proposed power. But, when there was no such necessity, he would never vest such a discretion in the Executive.

Mr. Dana observed that the principle laid down by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was worthy of attention; but it was extremely questionable whether it were applicable to the case then before them. If the amendment of the Senate went to acknowledge a general power in the President to dispense with the laws, a power once claimed as a prerogative by the King of Great Britain, all must be against it. But what was the power here proposed to be given? To authorize the President to continue the natural state of things in this country. The act of the last session went to change the general politics of the United States, whose general political system was peace, and freedom of commerce with the whole civilized world. That law impaired this principle, by taking away that freedom of commerce so far as respected Great Britain. Now, the power we propose to give is nearly allied to that exercised on a change from a state of peace to a state of war. Although the Legislature should change the state of things from peace to war, yet the President would be authorized to agree to an armistice, which would, for a time, restore peace, and suspend the laws. In point of principle, therefore, the power at present proposed to be given was similar to that exercised in the case of an armistice. Further, in giving this power to the President, we do no more than what we have done already. The President has given us merely general information relative to our negotiations with Great Britain; and, on his responsibility, we have passed the act sent to the Senate. He recommends a suspension of the non-importation law to a reasonable time, without specifying it. We fix the time. Perhaps the President may consider this reasonable time of suspension as extending to December. The language of the amendment is, if he thinks so, let him suspend it to that time. The same principle, therefore, is applicable to investing this power, as to the suspension we have already agreed to.

Mr. Dana said, he agreed that the amendment of the Senate was, in substance, nearly the same with the proposition rejected in the House. He was in favor of this proposition, and still continued favorable to it, because, he approved the extension of the suspension of the act to December, and because, he believed, if the power of suspending it were vested in the President, he would not suffer it to go into effect before that day.

Without going into the question, how far the commercial regulations were calculated to coerce Great Britain, Mr. D. said he would undertake to say that the operation of the non-importation act was more injurious to ourselves than Great Britain; and that it imposed such burdens on our merchants, and was so extremely vexatious to them, that he had little doubt of its suspension by the President, if he should be invested with the power. It would be recollected that the resolutions adopted by the House at their last session were very general; that they had been referred to a committee to bring in a bill, who had, from the pressure of circumstances, reported a bill very promptly, and with no other specification than that contained in the resolutions. In the construction given to this law, he understood no regard had been paid to labor, but merely to the material, the consequence of which was extremely vexatious. He would state an instance: Aqua fortis could only be imported in glass or gold vessels. A quantity had been imported into New York in glass vessels, and been refused entry because contained in glass. Mr. D. here specified some other articles, similarly circumstanced. He added that the provisions of the act were of so dubious a nature, that the Secretary of the Treasury had given no instructions respecting them. For these reasons, he thought the law would never be suffered to go into operation. It had, indeed, produced an effect, which the House, in passing it, had not contemplated, He would, therefore, have it done away altogether, and if they were to have any commercial prohibitions, he hoped they would be imposed in such language as all people might understand.

Mr. Bidwell said, before the question was taken, he would, in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut on his right, (Mr. Dana,) just observe, that any doubt or difficulty which had arisen, or might arise, in the execution of the law, from the general description of articles of manufacture, by their material of chief value, might be easily removed by a supplemental act. It was not strange nor new, that, in a complicated system of regulations, experience should point out practical defects in the details, and render legislative explanation or amendment necessary. It was no rational objection against the system. Notwithstanding any such imperfections in the details of the prohibitory act, he had no doubt that, whether left to the Executive or the Legislature, the act would be ultimately carried into full and complete effect, unless rendered unnecessary by an intervening arrangement of the points in dispute.

Mr. Dana said that, in the statement he had made, he did not state many of the inconveniences that had been experienced. Half the goods imported into New York since the non-importation law took effect had been refused entry. The law was, indeed, one which ought never to go into operation. As far as he was informed, the Government of Great Britain had as yet only given friendly assurances. He considered the existence of this law as a bar to satisfactory arrangements, and was, therefore, willing to lay it aside for the sake of peace and accommodation, not considering it as aiding, but as impeding our negotiations.

Mr. Chandler said, if he believed with the gentleman from Connecticut, that the President would, under any circumstances, no matter what, suspend the act, he would not give his vote for the proposed amendment. On the contrary, believing that he would let it go into effect, unless our differences were adjusted, it had his approbation. To remedy the evils mentioned, he would have no objection to doing away this act, after a proper time, and prescribing in a new act a double dose. He would pass an act prohibiting the importation of all goods from Great Britain. Believing the act had been attended with good consequences, and had brought the Government of that nation to a sense of their interests, and that there was a probability of an early adjustment of our differences, he should give his vote for the amendment.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays and the amendment carried—yeas 82, nays 23, as follows:

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

Mr. Lewis called for the order of the day, on the bill authorizing the erection of a bridge across the river Potomac.

Mr. Dawson urged the propriety of deferring the consideration of the bill to a future day, particularly as several of the members most interested in it were absent.

Mr. Lewis replied.—He said he should be extremely averse to taking up, intentionally, any subject in the absence of particular gentlemen. But the House would do him the justice to recollect that he had called it up on Friday, when the gentlemen referred to were present. It would be altogether impossible to get through the public business, if the absence of two or three gentlemen should prevent its being taken up. In the present instance, he believed there were as many gentlemen who were friendly to the bill absent, as there were of those inimical to it.

The House divided on going into Committee—ayes 44, noes 33.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

The several blanks were filled up in such a manner as to make the bill conformable to that which passed the House at the last session.

On filling the blank in the 12th section, which fixes the maximum of the clear average proceeds of tolls, after exceeding which, Congress reserve the right of reducing them, the House divided on allowing "twenty per centum"—ayes 38, noes 36; when the Committee rose and reported the bill.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. John Randolph offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to cause to be laid before this House an account, stating the several sums which have been expended on the Capitol, the President's house, the public offices, the navy yard, and the marine barracks, respectively; and the amount expended on other objects of public expense within the City of Washington.

Messrs. Alston and Olin suggested that it might be embarrassing to the public officers to give such a detailed and retrospective statement.

Mr. J. Randolph replied, that his object was to get information, for which purpose he wished to have a condensed view of the whole expenditures within the City of Washington. At present, when an appropriation for a particular object was called for, he possessed no standard of comparison whereby to determine its propriety. He wished to know the aggregate amount which this sink of expense, of increasing expense, has cost the nation, together with the several items of expenditure. He desired this information to guide him in judging of the future appropriations that might be asked. Suppose the House should undertake to build an University—he understood there was such a project—and they should have an estimate for it; by knowing what these buildings had cost, the frequent appropriations called for, and recollecting that every appropriation was the last, they would know how to act, and whether they were about to be involved in a sea of expense, the confines of which they could never learn. He believed this had been the case in the building in which they sat, the conduct of the persons employed on it having always fallen short of the promise made.

The resolution was then agreed to, without a division; and, on the next day, Messrs. J. Randolph and D. R. Williams appointed a committee to present it to the President.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Mr. Elliot rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

I will premise, Mr. Speaker, for the honor of my country, that but one sentiment has pervaded and agitated the American mind, in relation to what has been called, with more energy indeed than propriety, the blockade of the port of New York, in April last, by a small British naval force, and the atrocious murder of our fellow citizen, John Pierce, while in the peaceable pursuit of his honest occupation, by the order of the officer commanding that force. At that melancholy moment, when a dark cloud seemed to overshadow our political prospects, the laws of our country were, to borrow one of the bold figures of antiquity, silent amidst arms; they were languid, they were lifeless, when they ought to have been energetic and irresistible. The Executive made a prompt and patriotic use of the few and feeble means which the laws had placed in his power; but few and feeble indeed they were, and the most energetic exercise of them could not, in a degree calculated to add lustre to the national character, command the respect of foreign nations. I have not ascertained whether John Pierce was the father of a family: If such should be found to be the fact, and if some doubts which I have been led to entertain of the constitutionality of the proposition should be dissipated by further investigation, I should probably deem it my duty to propose that his children shall be educated at the public expense. I am opposed from principle to the erection of monuments, except in cases of a very extraordinary character; and in this case there can be no necessity for anything of that kind, as Pierce will have sufficient monuments in the memory of his fellow-citizens, and in the pages of his country's history.

But it is not my present purpose to compose an epicedium upon Pierce, or to move the erection of his monument. I have objects of more consequence in view. At the time of the occurrence of the unfortunate event to which I have alluded, and ever since, the question must have been continually inviting public attention, must have been commanding, and irresistibly forcing itself, upon public attention. Have we not, or do we not pretend to have, a naval armament for the purpose of national defence and protection? We have indeed the shadow of a navy. Economical, excessively economical as we are, we have already wasted millions on our infant navy to no useful purpose; and we are in a very fair way to waste millions more. The event which I have mentioned has, at least I am greatly mistaken if it has not, prepared the public mind for discussion and decision upon two important questions, relative to the Naval Establishment. First, whether it be not proper, under existing circumstances, to augment, in some small degree, that establishment? Secondly, whether, supposing the establishment to be increased or to remain as it is, it be not proper, it be not indispensably necessary, to organize and manage it in a different manner from what has been heretofore practised; to give it more efficiency and more energy? To these questions it is my intention to invite the attention of this House and the American nation.

It is time, however, to think and talk of something else besides our little navy;—that armament, which the wicked wits of our own country, and the still more wicked politicians of the old world, have called a Lilliputian navy; and which the latter description of persons, rather the most important of the two, in point of influence upon human character and human happiness, affect to consider as the disgrace of America, the ridicule of Europe. It is time to extend our views. It is time (if we can elevate our enfeebled optics to a more ample field of political vision) to look over the St. Croix on the one hand, and the Sabine on the other, to behold the course of events in other regions of the world, to reflect upon the influence of those events on our own concerns, and to inquire and understand how our interests are affected by or involved in them. It is time to explode the narrow, the ridiculous, the all-destroying policy, that would dictate to the people of the Western world a total unconcernedness about the scenes that are displayed in the other regions of the globe. It is time to know who and where we are, and what will probably be our future destiny. In a word, it is time to change our system. What is the news of the day? Here many will inquire, what have we to do with the news of the day? And some will consider it a species of treason to interest ourselves in the fortunes of other nations. Treason against whom, or what? Against the power of France, I suppose; for it can be treason against nothing else.

But what is the news, and what is it to us? Rumor announces that Prussia—Prussia, one of the first monarchies of Europe, has fallen! Fallen in a war purely defensive, in defence of the integrity of her territory! She has had the singular fate to fall unpitied, and yet covered with imperishable glory: unconquered by superior courage, or even by superior dicipline, but overwhelmed by numbers.

And what have the people of Republican America to do with the destruction of the monarchy of Prussia? Why, sir, upon every sober and solid principle of human calculation, it is our turn next. I will undertake to demonstrate, on some future day, that except in point of local situation, except in our remoteness from the great scene of European action, we occupy substantially the same ground that Prussia did, ante bellum, and that we ought to prepare ourselves to avert the same awful fate. I shall deem it my duty, when I go into this subject, to take a view of the present state of almost all the world; and if I prove not the fact which I have stated, I will instantly descend from this seat. Descend, did I say? No, I am not so fond of going down hill—I will ascend to a place among that most illustrious body, the people. Prussia was required to give up some provinces of her dominions, or have them taken from her. So are we. It will be said, not by the same Power; but it shall be shown to the satisfaction of this nation (for we ourselves know already) that it ought to be so considered by us. The demand is made by Spain, a Power which all the world knows to be subservient to the policy of France, and to be directed and governed by France in her concerns with the United States, in consequence of a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between the two nations, to say the least of their connexions. In proving this important, this solemn fact, not a word shall be said concerning certain documents, which have derived most astonishing celebrity from their impenetrable obscurity. No, Mr. Speaker, I will not disturb the repose of your seat, or that of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on a future day, by any transgression of the rules of the House. I will not wander for a moment from the circle of perfect order. Nothing shall be said of the contents of those documents; but much, very much, shall be said of what they do not contain, and much of what the people may have suspected that they do contain; and regret shall again and again be expressed, that our superiors and masters, the sovereign people of this great nation, whom in all things else we delight to honor, are not permitted to see, examine, reflect, and decide upon them for themselves. In the meantime, I say, change your system of foreign politics. We must enlarge our views and alter our course of conduct, or we shall deserve the chains that are forging for us. Political life and death are set before you. Choose ye, therefore, whether ye will live or die.

Let me not be misunderstood. I approve the domestic administration of the Government of this country, and the general system which the Executive is pursuing in relation to our concerns with foreign nations—approve it with all my heart, and will support it with all my powers. And how is all this to be reconciled with the declaration that we must change our system? The easiest thing in the world. The system of national defence and protection is a part of your foreign politics, strictly considered, rather than of domestic politics. And where and what are your arrangements for national defence? Or rather, is not your country almost totally defenceless? We, we ourselves, not the Executive—we, the immediate representatives of the people, hold the purse-strings of the nation; and the world has long looked on with astonishment, not unmingled with contempt, at the miserly but convulsive grasp with which we embrace them. And what is the state of our finances? Is it such as to render necessary this extreme parsimony? With an overflowing Treasury; with an accumulation of revenue, which enables us to purchase empires, and at the same time rapidly reduce a debt, the pressure of which no man feels, or ever can feel; with a debt which is but the dust of the balance in which are suspended our national resources; our naval establishment is inferior to that which was possessed by the little State of Ragusa, the last of the republics of the ancient world, previously to its recent destruction by the power of France: Ragusa, which possessed but one considerable port, perhaps twenty or thirty miles of barren seacoast, and a population of from 80,000 to 120,000 souls. Apropos of Ragusa. Who would not mourn for Ragusa? Every republican on earth ought to shed a tear for its fate! Who were the Ragusans? Were they among the conspirators against the liberties and national independence of France, who are said to have held their caucusses at Pilnitz and at Pavia? Were they subsidized by British gold? Were they the enemies of any people on the globe? Ah! No. They were a simple, peaceful, unambitious, industrious, virtuous, republican people. They were so far from being the enemies of any nation, that they were the friends of all the world; that they might enjoy the privilege of managing their own concerns in their own manner, as to their domestic legislation, they always paid tribute to every nation that demanded tribute from them; and on this humiliating condition they were suffered to exist as a republic through almost all the revolutions of ages. They did exist—they are now slaves! And it is a memorable fact that the Emperor of France has not even pretended that the Ragusans were hostile to his interests. Political necessity alone justifies, or attempts to justify, the seizure of their dominions. And when would their fate be ours, if the means of destruction were at hand? To-morrow!

It is certainly time to think and act with more energy. This great and solemn subject has long attracted my attention, and occupied my silent reflections. Our local habitation is our only security. Were it not for the vast waves of the vast ocean, it would be the merest folly that could be imagined to tie up your roof with those strings that dangle so delightfully over our heads. Were it not for that noble and all-protecting element, why in the name of Heaven would you prop up these tottering walls any longer? Let them alone, and crazy as they are, and they are crazy enough in all conscience, they would last ten times as long as the noble structure of your republic itself! At least ten times as long. But many think we are in no danger. They must be very pious men; they must have a confidence in Divine Providence, in which I should not like to be behind them; or they must possess a degree of self-confidence, the possession of which I do not envy them. Does any one believe that our Army and Navy, that our militia, numerous, brave, and patriotic as it is, could resist for a moment three millions of European veterans in arms? Could we resist the power of France, if that power could be brought to bear upon us? He who could say so, should wander into the wilderness; he should go at least to the extreme limit of the desert heath that surrounds us, and talk to the woods and to the winds. No human ear could listen for a moment with patience to such idle fanfaronade. One word more upon the subject of our Treasury and our debt. It has frequently been said that the present is the age of wonders; and we have another proof of it this very session within these walls. Could you call old Solomon himself from the "vasty deep," and give him a seat among us—and as he would be but a shade, I suppose you would consider him only as a kind of Territorial delegate, with a right of debating but not of voting—could you get him here, the very first step of his parliamentary career would be to move to strike out a section of the sacred volume, inserted by his own pen, the words, "there is nothing new under the sun." In the Journal of our proceedings upon the President's Message, we have a record of this sort: "Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to the future appropriation of the surplus revenue, &c., be referred to a select committee." This is a new kind of Committee of Ways and Means. It must be called, I suppose, Committee of Ways and Means, No. 2. Committees of this description, organized for the purpose of devising means to carry on the great concerns of nations, are of some antiquity; but this is the first committee that has ever been created for the purpose of devising ways and means to get rid of the surplus moneys of a Government. I can point the gentlemen of this committee to an object worthy of their attention: the defence of their country opens an ample and honorable field for their labors. But it is time to disclose my own system more particularly. I will keep the House in suspense no longer. I would imitate the magnanimous, but at the same time very prudent policy of the Emperor of Austria, approved, or at least not censured, by the Emperor of France himself, by establishing a powerful armed neutrality. I would organize a general and effectual system of national defence. Here, again, let me not be misunderstood. I am no friend to large armies and navies, or new and oppressive taxes. The system should be economical as well as energetic.

Upon this subject I have long waited, like Elihu of old, that older men might speak, but no one opens his lips; and silence in future would be a dereliction of what I deem one of the first and dearest interests of my country. Perhaps in my manner of announcing my intentions and objects, although it has been conformable to every day's practice in the British Parliament, I may not have been considered as conforming perfectly to the rules of order here; but if order has been violated, the transgression shall not be repeated. I have risen at this time merely to call the attention of the House to the subject, and to give notice that I shall, on Tuesday of next week, (as it is proper to lead the public mind gradually to the contemplation of concerns of such importance,) offer to the consideration of the House a series of resolutions, the objects of which will be to produce a discussion and decision upon the two great questions which I have mentioned, relative to the Naval Establishment; to introduce, at all events, into the organization and management of that establishment, a new and more efficient system; and to prepare and organize other measures, calculated for the farther and more effectual protection of the commerce, the seamen, the harbors, the coasts, and the frontiers of the United States.

Mr. E. having concluded, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 16.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to change the name of the District of Nanjemoy to that of St. Mary; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

The House proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. DANA, of yesterday, which lay on the table: Whereupon, the said motion being again read in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for a survey of the coasts of the United States, designating the several islands, with the shoals and roads, or places of anchorage, within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States:

A motion was made by Mr. CROWINSHIELD, and the question being put, to amend the same, by adding, to the end thereof, the following words, to wit:

"And that the committee be farther instructed to inquire into the expediency of surveying St. George's bank, or any other shoals or banks, which may be deemed dangerous to vessels approaching the shores of the United States:"

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said resolution, as amended.

Mr. JOSEPH CLAY presented to the House a petition of sundry officers who served in the British army, in America, during the war between France and Great Britain, praying to be confirmed in their respective titles to the lands in the State of Kentucky, granted to them by the King of Great Britain, in consideration of military services rendered to the American Colonies during the said war.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAWSON moved to postpone the further consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill, authorizing the erection of a bridge across the Potomac, to the first Monday in January; this motion was opposed by Messrs. LEWIS and COOK, and disagreed to—yeas 36, nays 55; when, on motion of Mr. LEWIS, the House took the report into consideration—yeas 53.

After the adoption of several amendments, the bill was ordered to a third reading to-morrow—yeas 55.

WEDNESDAY, December 17.

Two other members, to wit: PELEG WADSWORTH, from Massachusetts, and DANIEL C. VERPLANCK, from New York, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee appointed on the 10th instant, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution appointing a committee, jointly, with a committee to be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to have the direction of the money appropriated to purchase books for the use of Congress, pursuant to the "Act making a further appropriation for the support of a library," passed on the 21st of February, 1806.

Mr. DAWSON presented to the House a petition of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Alexandria and Washington, in the Territory of Columbia; which was received and read, praying that an act may be passed to incorporate a company for the purpose of making a turnpike road from the western end of Mason's causeway, to the town of Alexandria, upon such terms, and under such restrictions, as may be just and reasonable.—Referred to Mr. DAWSON, Mr. MAGRUDER, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. VERPLANCK, and Mr. CUTTS, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The SPEAKER informed the House that he had received an anonymous communication, addressed to Congress, from a writer who professed himself to be a foreigner, and desired his communication might be read with closed doors.

A short conversation ensued on the proper way of treating the communication; when it was agreed that it was best to take no order whatever upon it.

BRIDGE OVER THE POTOMAC.

An engrossed bill authorizing the erection of a bridge over the river Potomac, within the District of Columbia, was read the third time, and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 60, nays 39, as follows:

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit the importation or bringing of slaves into the United States or the territories thereof after the 31st of December, 1807. The bill was read, as follows:

A Bill to prohibit the importation or bringing of slaves into the United States, or the territories thereof, after the thirty-first day of December, 1807.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, from and after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven, it shall not be lawful to import or bring into the United States, or the territories thereof, any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, with intent to keep, sell, or dispose of such negro, mulatto, or person of color, as a slave.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall, after the 31st day of December, aforesaid, build, equip, fit, load, or in any wise prepare, or shall engage or be concerned in preparing, loading, fitting, equipping, or building any ship or vessel, in any port or place within the jurisdictional limits of the Government of the United States, for the purpose of employing such ship or vessel in importing or bringing into the United States, or the territories thereof, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, the importation or bringing of whom is by this act prohibited, every such person shall forfeit and pay —— dollars; and such ship or vessel shall, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture, be forfeited.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel, laden in whole or in part with persons, the importation or bringing of whom is by this act prohibited, shall, after the thirty-first day of December aforesaid, be found in any river, port, bay, or harbor, within the United States or the territories thereof, or anywhere on the high seas within the jurisdictional limits of the Government of the United States, such ship or vessel, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited, and the owner and master thereof shall moreover each forfeit and pay —— dollars. And the President of the United States is hereby authorized to employ such of the armed vessels as he may judge proper, in giving to this act full and complete effect.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any negro, mulatto, or person of color, the importation or bringing of whom is by this act prohibited, shall, after the thirty-first day of December aforesaid, be found within the United States or the territories thereof, every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, shall be forfeited. And if any person or persons shall be concerned in buying or selling such negro, mulatto, or person of color, every person so concerned shall forfeit and pay —— dollars for each negro, mulatto, or person of color so bought or sold.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall appear to the court before which any suit or prosecution shall be brought, or any claim shall be tried, under the provisions of this act, that there is reasonable ground for presumption against the party sued or prosecuted, or making the claim, it shall be the duty of the said court to throw the burden of proof upon such party. And that when any seizure shall be made, or suit or prosecution commenced as aforesaid, and judgment shall be given in favor of the claimant, or party sued or prosecuted, if it shall appear to the court that there was reasonable cause for such seizure, or such suit or prosecution, the said court shall cause a proper certificate or entry to be made thereof, and in such case the party claiming, sued, or prosecuted, shall not be entitled to costs, nor shall the person making the seizure, or instituting the suit or prosecution, be liable to any action or judgment on account thereof.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures arising under this act may be sued for and recovered, and shall be distributed and accounted for in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage." And such penalties and forfeitures may be examined, mitigated, or remitted in like manner and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrictions as are prescribed, authorized, and directed by the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned."

The first blank was filled with 5,000, the second with 10,000 and the third with 500.

Mr. Sloan moved to insert, in the fourth section, after the word "forfeited," the following words: "And such person or slave shall be entitled to his freedom," so as to make the provision read—that if any negro, mulatto, or person of color, the importation or bringing of whom is by this act prohibited, shall, after the 31st day of December aforesaid, be found within the United States or the territories thereof, every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, shall be forfeited, and such person or slave shall be entitled to his freedom.

Mr. Alston doubted whether Congress possessed the power of saying that slaves imported into a particular State, whose laws directed them to be sold, should be made free.

Mr. Elmer considered the amendment as altogether useless.

Mr. Eppes moved to amend the amendment by adding to it the following proviso: "Provided, That such forfeiture shall take place in one of the States of the Union where slavery is not by law permitted."

This last amendment was disagreed to—ayes 31.

Mr. Bidwell suggested a modification of the amendment, so as to make it read, "and shall be entitled to his or her freedom." To which Mr. Sloan assented.

Mr. Early said, he would barely ask of the mover of the amendment, whether there was not a palpable absurdity between the amendment and that part of the bill to which it was offered as an amendment; whether there was not an absurdity in saying the description of persons referred to should be forfeited, and sold by the United States as provided for in the sixth section, and yet that they should be free; whether the two things could exist together?

Mr. Sloan said, he would ask whether it was not the understanding of every member of the committee, that it ought to be the object of this bill totally to prohibit the importation of slaves into, or the selling them in the United States. He would not pretend to say his amendment would effectually answer this purpose; it might require alteration, and he acknowledged there was an apparent contradiction between it and the provisions of the bill. But it was the principle which it contained, that he was anxious to see adopted.

Mr. Early said there was no doubt but that the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey would have the effect of trying the sense of the House on a very important principle contained in the bill; on the question whether they would or would not agree to pass a bill on this subject, which would be efficacious. For myself, said Mr. E., I have always believed that on the decision of this question would turn another, whether this Government ever would prohibit the slave trade or not? It is true, if we pass the bill as it stands, that persons imported will not only be forfeited, but will likewise be sold as slaves, and be afterwards kept as such. This is a melancholy truth; melancholy, because, without such a provision, we can pass no law on the subject that will be effectual. What can we do with this description of persons in case they are brought into the country in contravention of this act? I repeat the question—what can we do with them? If any gentleman can devise a plan, on which they can be disposed of, without proving extremely injurious to the country where the disposition shall be made, less exceptionable than the plan contained in this bill, he shall have my thanks, and what is of more consequence, he shall have my vote. I believe, however, that the plan contained in the bill will be the most effectual that can be devised. The gentleman inquires whether the bill is not intended to prevent the importation of this description of people into the United States, and to prevent their being sold here as slaves? I answer that it is; and I ask, if the law prohibiting the importation of brandy in demijohns was not intended to prevent its being brought into the United States in that way; and yet, do the United States, instead of selling it as a forfeited article, scatter it about the streets when thus introduced in contravention of the laws? I repeat it—on the decision of this question will depend the efficacy of the bill. We, who live in that part of the United States, where the evil referred to principally exists, know from experience that this is the only effectual plan that can be pursued. I will conclude my remarks by again declaring, that if any gentleman will devise another practicable plan, he shall have my vote.

Mr. Alston was decidedly of opinion that if the amendment prevailed, the bill on the table would be good for nothing. The amendment proposes that the slaves imported shall be forfeited and become free. Thus all inducement to give information of their importation would be taken away. You cannot, said Mr. A., prevent them from being slaves when they are once brought into the United States; the only way is to prevent the importation. In the State which I have the honor of representing, this mode had been practised; the importation of slaves had for ten or twelve years been prohibited under a penalty of 200 pounds. This had completely prevented any importation by water, in which way not a single slave had been imported. Some, it was true, had been introduced from adjoining States. The amendment might have another effect. What was there to prevent this description of persons, although made free, from binding themselves out for a term of years, or for life?

Mr. Sloan said he would just observe that the simile drawn by his friend from Georgia did not apply in the present instance. He had never considered the act prohibiting the importation of brandy in demijohns, as intended to prohibit the importation of brandy, but merely the particular mode of importing it. It appeared to be the universal wish of every member in the Committee to put an entire stop to this inhuman traffic. He would then ask for information, (he would not say that he was perfectly able to explain the Constitution on this point,) whether it was not in the power of the House as completely to prohibit this trade as the Parliament of Great Britain? If he was rightly informed, as soon as a slave put his foot into that country, he became free. If this was among the Constitutional powers of the Government, he hoped it would be exercised; and if this amendment should be rejected, he trusted some other, calculated to be more efficacious, would be adopted.

Mr. Smilie was not prepared at present to say what was the best to be done; but he would never give his assent to the last section of the bill. Shall we, said he, while we are attempting to put a stop to this traffic, take upon ourselves the odium of becoming slave traders? This would be the fact, in case the bill were agreed to. We will not suffer others to bring them to our shores with the view of selling them, but we agree to become their proprietors, and to sell them ourselves. I hope in God the House will never agree to this. I have no objection to be at the expense of sending them back to their own country, if this shall be deemed proper, or to pursuing any other mode which may be deemed advisable.

Mr. Early said it was time enough, when the last section was under consideration, to examine any plan or reasons which might be offered in support of it, for altering the provisions in that section. At present, the fourth section only was under consideration, and there appeared to him a peculiar impropriety in adopting the proposed amendment, as applicable to that section, for several reasons. That section does not operate on vessels fitting out for the slave trade, or on vessels in the waters of the United States having persons of this description on board. It operates only on the individual cases of buying and selling, between man and man, after the persons have been brought into the territory of the United States. It operated, therefore, on persons so far as related to a property in them, on which only the State laws can operate. Mr. E. begged leave to read the section:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, if any negro, mulatto, or person of color, the importation or bringing of whom is by this act prohibited, shall, after the thirty-first day of December aforesaid, be found within the United States, or the territories thereof, every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, shall be forfeited. And, if any person or persons shall be concerned in buying or selling such negro, mulatto, or person of color, every person so concerned shall forfeit and pay $—— for each negro, mulatto, or person of color, so bought or sold."

He would ask the gentleman, whether the House, or the Government of the United States, were Constitutionally competent to declare what should, or should not, be property within the several States? They were not competent to this, after the article, considered as property, was brought within the limits of the United States.

Mr. BARKER.—It appears to me, either that the gentleman from Georgia does not understand the spirit of this section, or that I do not. If any description of persons are imported and forfeited, to whom are they forfeited? Not to the particular States where they are landed, but to the United States, whose property they become, and who have, therefore, a right to say they shall be free; and in order to effect this purpose, they may say that they shall be sent back to the country from whence they came. Certainly, they have as great a right to make them free as to sell them.

Mr. SLOAN declared his concurrence in opinion with his friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. BARKER.)

Mr. BIDWELL.—Gentlemen from all quarters appear to agree in the end they have in view. The only difference of opinion is, with respect to the most proper means to be used. The gentleman from Georgia thinks that, if the amendment be adopted, the bill will be ineffectual; while the gentleman from New Jersey is of the opinion that, without it, it will be ineffectual. The amendment undoubtedly embraces a most important principle. Without it, the gentleman from Georgia admits, that the description of persons referred to will be transferred from their individual owners to the United States, as property, and be by them sold as slaves, and be held afterwards in slavery. This is admitted to be the effect of the bill. It is objected to for several reasons. The first reason assigned is, that if the amendment takes place, and if by virtue of it these people should be entitled to their freedom, instead of being protected in their freedom, they will enter into indentures with their holders, and their condition be the same as though they were in slavery. But, the very idea of indentures implies freedom, and this objection is applicable to every other description of persons whose ignorance renders them the easy subjects of imposition. Slaves, liberated under existing circumstances from servitude, are equally liable to be overreached.

Another objection is, that the amendment is repugnant to the principle of the bill, inasmuch as the preceding clause declares that this description of persons shall be forfeited, and their being made free is considered as incompatible with their forfeiture. I do not, however, view the case in that light. What is this forfeiture but a cessation of the interest of the former owner in the thing forfeited, and its transfer to the United States? And, cannot the United States, instead of selling, manumit them? The operation, therefore, of the amendment will be, that the property of the United States in them will determine, and that no person will have a property in them, but that they will be free; or, in other words, that instead of property, as the bill now stands, being vested in the United States, it will be renounced. The United States will not take the property themselves, or pass it over to any other person. They will say the property shall entirely terminate. Is there anything in this, repugnant to the Constitution? The gentleman from Georgia says this Government has not a right to interfere with State rights or State property. But, would it be any interference with State rights to say, that, in case a particular article should become the property of the United States, they would not take it? As to the previous owner's giving the slaves their freedom, would it not operate exactly in the same way as forfeiting them? If, then, there would be no interference with State rights in the one case, there would not in the other. The only difference would consist in the transfer of the property, the operation of the amendment being to make a donation, or whatever else gentlemen may please to call it, to the persons, of their freedom.

If it shall be said, that the provision contained in the amendment will operate inconveniently, by turning these persons loose upon society, a remedy may be applied. A sufficient authority on this head exists in the State governments. If paupers, vagabonds, or any other troublesome description of persons be introduced among them, every State has a right to impose penalties on the persons introducing them. So, in the present case, the State authorities may be enforced, in addition to such punishments as the United States may see fit to inflict for the purposes of general welfare. I am, for these reasons, of opinion, that the amendment, so far from rendering the bill less efficient, will make it more so.

Mr. MACON, (Speaker.)—I believe that on this subject there is but one opinion, which is, effectually to prohibit the importation of slaves into the United States. This sentiment, I believe, pervades the breast of every member of the community. In adopting our measures on this subject, we must pass such a law as can be executed; such an one as every part of the Union shall deem itself interested in carrying into effect. If we insert in it a clause, in the execution of which every part of the Union does not consider itself interested, we shall prevent the law from going into full operation. The proposed amendment goes to make this description of persons, that shall be imported, free. What will be its effect? What is to become of the cargoes of those persons, when thus turned loose in any State? By what means are they, understanding nothing about the country, to be supported? Not even speaking the language of the country, what is to become of them? Are they to be maintained by the public or by individuals? This question is deserving of some consideration. It is a subject, I confess, on which there is some difficulty. For my part, I wish the law to be made so strong as to prevent any vessel from bringing them into the United States. But, I believe the amendment contains a provision that some of the States will not like. In some of the States, there is a legal provision that an owner of a slave may give him his freedom, on going into court, and giving security that the slave that is liberated shall not be a charge upon the county. Those persons who deal in this nefarious traffic will never carry their cargoes into a part of the Union where there are no slaves. They will go to the States where slavery exists, and there smuggle them; and, if we pass this amendment, the situation of these States will be most deplorable.

It does not appear to me necessary to insert this amendment in the bill, in order to carry it into execution. The great object is, to prevent the importation; and, so far as relates to this end, the amendment will weaken the bill. Perhaps I may be under the influence of local prejudice, but there is no State in the Union more opposed to the importation of slaves than the State which I have the honor to represent. It was proposed by her, ten years ago, so to amend the Constitution as to give Congress the power of prohibiting the importation of slaves. I believe the proposition passed by an unanimous vote. Certain I am, it had my hearty approbation. But it seems to me if you give these people their freedom, and turn them loose, they must perish. As, therefore, the amendment is not essential to the law being carried into execution, I am opposed to it, not wishing to pass a law that will be disagreeable to any part of the Union.

Mr. EARLY.—It is not my intention to trespass on the patience of the House, or to press on gentlemen a greater attention to this important bill than they seem willing to give. I believe it is the view of every member of the Committee, and all parts of the nation, to put an end to this traffic; and I am persuaded I shall be believed by the Committee, when I assure them that, in framing this bill, I had my eye on those provisions which I thought would be best calculated to effect this desirable object. For the present, I barely mean to improve a little on the ideas thrown out by the honorable SPEAKER, which, in my opinion, admit of several most important views.

It is a principle in legislation, as correct as any which has ever prevailed, that to give effect to laws, you must not make them repugnant to the passions and wishes of the people among whom they are to operate. How then, in this instance, stands the fact? Do not gentlemen from every quarter of the Union prove, on the discussion of every question that has ever arisen in the House, having the most remote bearing on the giving freedom to the Africans in the bosom of our country, that it has excited the deepest sensibility in the breasts of those where slavery exists? And why is this so? It is, because those who, from experience, know the extent of the evil, believe that the most formidable aspect in which it can present itself, is by making these people free among them. Yes, sir, though slavery is an evil, regretted by every man in the country, to have among us in any considerable quantity persons of this description, is an evil far greater than slavery itself. Does any gentleman want proof of this. I answer that all proof is useless; no fact can be more notorious. With this belief on the minds of the people where slavery exists, and where the importation will take place, if at all, we are about to turn loose in a state of freedom all persons brought in after the passage of this law. I ask gentlemen to reflect and say whether such a law, opposed to the ideas, the passions, the views, and the affections of the people of the Southern States, can be executed? I tell them, no; it is impossible—why? Because no man will inform—why? Because to inform will be to lead to an evil which will be deemed greater than the offence of which information is given, because it will be opposed to the principle of self-preservation, and to the love of family. No, no man will be disposed to jeopard his life, and the lives of his countrymen. And if no one dare inform, the whole authority of the Government cannot carry the law into effect. The whole people will rise up against it. Why? Because to enforce it would be to turn loose, in the bosom of the country, firebrands that would consume them; for the best and strongest of all reasons, because men love their own preservation too well to take the steps most fitted to endanger it. This Committee need not now be told, that wherever people of color are found in a state of freedom—I mean in the States where they are found in considerable numbers—they are considered as the instruments of murder, theft, and conflagration. Suppose the power of the General Government able for a while to enforce such a provision, and to turn loose a few, or even a single cargo of persons of color, what do gentlemen suppose would become of them? Do they suppose the people of those States would permit them to live among them? They are mistaken. We are told it is cruel and disgraceful to keep them in slavery. There is no doubt of it. But would it not be more cruel to place them in a situation where we must in self-defence—gentlemen will understand me—get rid of them in some way. We must either get rid of them, or they of us; there is no alternative, and I leave it to gentlemen to determine which course would be pursued. There can be no doubt on this head. I will speak out; it is not my practice to be mealy-mouthed on a subject of importance. Not one of them would be left alive in a year. But I am not disposed on this occasion to stir up those sensibilities which are, on almost every question touching this subject, so apt to be excited. I feel it, however, my duty candidly to state my views on the subject; and if I have done it in plain language, I hope I shall be excused. People in any situation will be governed by the principle of self-preservation; and I beg gentlemen seriously to consider before they take measures which will place us and the people of color in a situation in which we must determine between our own lives and theirs.

Mr. J. Clay.—I shall vote against this amendment because I think it goes to destroy the efficacy of the bill. I have uniformly wished that Congress had possessed and exercised at a much earlier period the power of preventing the importation of slaves. But the effect of turning loose this species of property will be peculiarly dangerous. And whether the apprehension entertained be real or chimerical, the consequences will be precisely the same. If such be the opinion entertained of turning them loose, to set at large two or three hundred of those persons, ignorant and unacquainted with our language or habits, will, in fact, be turning loose so many depredators of the worst kind. Holding no communion with the whites, the morals of their associates will be corrupted, and ideas of freedom, however just in the abstract, will be inculcated, and may probably excite insurrections. Under this view of the subject, I ask whether any person in the Southern country will turn informer? I think not. So far as to the effects of this provision on the Southern country. Let us now come nearer home. Suppose there should be an information. The laws in several of the Southern States prevent the liberation of a slave, but on condition of his leaving the State. They will consequently migrate to the States where free persons of color are permitted to reside. Now I will ask my colleague, and the gentlemen from the Eastern States, whether, with this species of population, they would wish to increase their numbers? But whatever may be my final opinion on the bill, I believe the Committee are not at present prepared to act upon it. I therefore move that they rise.

Mr. Sloan begged to explain in a few words. He had not been understood. He had listened attentively to the gentleman from Georgia, and he was at a loss to know what had dropped from him calculated to excite his warmth; he appealed to the Committee if he had not expressed himself in the most conciliatory terms. He had stated the provision under consideration in such a way as to give no offence, and the gentleman would recollect that he had intimated that a further provision might be incorporated in the bill, to send back those persons of color that might be imported in contravention of law.

Mr. Smilie was in favor of the Committee rising, as he was confident the bill would not anwer in its present shape. He did not, however, pretend to say, that the amendment was the best that could be devised. He doubted whether it was. As the bill stood, they were involved in this difficulty. They must either adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, or some one like it, or they would not avoid the odium of becoming themselves slave traders. He hoped, therefore, when the Committee rose, the House would agree to recommit the bill. Mr. S. said, he did not wish, by any means, to increase an evil which was too great already. He perceived one advantage that would attend the amendment. If the opinion of the Southern people was such as the gentleman from Georgia had represented it to be, they would not admit the importation of a single slave. He hoped, however, that the bill would be recommitted, and some effectual provision introduced. At present, he was inclined to think that the best remedy would be to send these people back to the country from which they came.

Mr. Quincy regretted that a motion had been made for the Committee to rise, as he considered it proper, previous to a recommitment of the bill, to ascertain the sense of the House on so important a principle as that contained in the amendment. Believing that they ought to do nothing contrary to the safety and the true interest of any part of the Union, and that this provision would have this effect, he was hostile to it, under the impression that it would be altogether ineffectual. He believed there would be found little difficulty in defeating it. What was to prevent the Legislature of Georgia, after Congress have declared these people shall be free, considering them as vagabonds, and selling them for a term of years, or for life, to the highest bidder. Mr. Q. concluded by saying, he wished the question to be taken on the amendment, that, after its rejection, the committee, to whom the bill should be referred, might direct their minds to a more effectual provision.

Mr. Macon, (Speaker.)—The gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he attends to the subject, will perceive that the recommitment of the bill will be of no use, until the principle under discussion shall be first settled. For my own part, I wish to frame such a law as shall prevent a single slave from being imported. It is objected to this bill, that it provides for these persons being sold, and for the United States receiving the proceeds. But let us examine this objection. Do not gentlemen recollect that, in case a judgment is obtained by the United States against an inhabitant of the Southern country possessed of slaves, they are liable to sale, and the money derived from them to be brought into the Treasury? To rise, without settling this point, will be useless; the committee, to whom the bill may be referred, will still remain in the dark, as to the sense of the House; they will be without any decision to guide them. Let this question then be first decided, and the bill be afterwards recommitted, if any new details are requisite.

I think one of the amendments suggested a good one, if there is any probability of its being executed. But what spirit is it that brings this description of people among us? Not the spirit of philanthropy, but the spirit of interest. And if we send these people back, the same spirit that brought them here will carry them to some other quarter of the globe, with the same views. If it shall be prescribed that the United States shall carry them back, that is, indeed, another question. I have no doubt this could be done.

There is, however, another question that presents itself on this same point. How are the United States, when they get them to Africa, to carry them to their own country, if it should not be situated on the seacoast? And if they set them loose and unarmed among nations who themselves pursue this traffic, they will be again seized and transported to other countries, where they may be sold. I believe the only effectual way to prevent their importation is, to impose heavy penalties, in enforcing which the citizens of the Union will generally concur. As the bill stands, it is, in my opinion, better calculated to have this effect than it would have with the amendment.

Mr. Early said, before the question was taken on the rising of the Committee, he wished to offer a word or two by way of explanation. From the observations of a gentleman from Massachusetts, he apprehended an expression used by him had been somewhat misunderstood. He alluded to the term "dare." In using this word he had meant to say, that the revenue officers, and no other persons, would dare to inform, because the passions of the people would be opposed to them. He begged that what he had said might be considered in this light and in no other.

While he was up he would add one word. The present objection to the bill seemed to arise from the repugnance of gentlemen to making the United States dealers in slaves. On this point he would ask a single question: How are we to enforce a single penalty of this law without consenting to become dealers in slaves? We have already affixed a penalty of $10,000, of $5,000, and of $500 to certain acts. How are these to be executed but on the real and personal property of individuals; and what are slaves in the Southern country but personal property? Without this power, therefore, we might not be able to recover a single dollar.

The question was then put, and the House divided on the Committee rising—yeas 41, nays 46.

Mr. Cook hoped the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey would not prevail, the object of which would be to let loose a set of banditti, in hostility to the whole country; and if the amendment was introduced he did not believe it could be carried into effect. Whether some other regulation might not be introduced, was another question. At present he should give his hearty negative to the amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment, which was disagreed to, only nineteen members rising in its favor.

Mr. Bedinger moved to strike out the following words in the first section, after the word "color," "with intent to keep, sell, or dispose of such negro, mulatto, or person of color, as a slave." Mr. B. said his object was to prohibit persons of color from being brought into the United States, no matter what the intention was, with which they were introduced. Should this amendment be agreed to, his view was to offer another, imposing a penalty of one thousand dollars for every person thus imported.

Mr. Macon said he had no objection to making the law as strong as possible, but when this subject was before under consideration, some objection had been made to a like provision then proposed; and it was observed, that vessels trading to the East Indies were frequently compelled to avail themselves of the assistance of persons of color. He did not wish to throw any impediment in the way of a fair trade, although if such a provision were not objected to by mercantile men, he should have no objection to it whatever.

Mr. Bedinger said he had been induced to make the motion, from fatal experience. The laws of the State he represented, required persons introducing slaves, to take an oath that they did not intend to sell them, and yet they often did sell them; and when told that in doing so they had violated the law, they had replied, that they did not originally intend it, but were driven to it by their necessities.

Mr. Early had no objection to making this provision as extensive as gentlemen could wish, and to agreeing to a proper amendment, after it had been contemplated in all its bearings on the other parts of the bill; he wished to know, if such an amendment should be made, whether Mellimelli, or any person of color, could come to the United States. He doubted whether any of the Barbary Powers would, under such a provision, be permitted to send an Ambassador. For his own part he should have no objection to this, as he did not wish to see here any more Mellimellis.

Mr. Alston said he was in favor of such an amendment, as without it the bill would not be efficacious. The objection of the gentleman from Georgia did not apply. The description of persons referred to as proper to be excepted, could not be said to be imported, a term whose meaning only embraced those who were brought in by others. If the bill should be permitted to remain in its present shape, he would ask how the intention of an importer was to be ascertained, and whether if oath were made, that it was the intention not to sell them or treat them as slaves, the revenue officers would not be obliged to admit the importation? He therefore thought some such provision as had been mentioned necessary; but whether this was the precise one, he was not at present prepared to say; he thought it best for the Committee to rise.

Mr. Early thought some alteration in the wording of the section highly necessary. He believed it might be so altered as to guard not only against the apprehended evil, but likewise against one still greater than the bringing slaves into the Southern country. He alluded to the introduction of persons of color from the West India islands, who under the existing laws were not considered slaves. To afford an opportunity to mature some such amendment he moved that the Committee should rise.

Mr. Ely said there was another circumstance which rendered it necessary for the Committee to rise; there was another evil which required cure. According to two of the sections of the bill, the cargo was to be forfeited, if it should be brought into a State where there was no slavery. What would the effect be there? It would be a question whether they would be thereby manumitted? They were as liable to be brought into Massachusetts, where slavery was not permitted, as into any other State; and if sold in Massachusetts he wished to know what effect would ensue? If they were about to adopt a system of slavery in that State, he hoped neither the gentlemen from the North or the South would be in favor of the provision, as it would be in direct contravention of one of the principles of her constitution. For this reason, among others, he thought the subject required serious consideration, and that it was advisable for the Committee to rise, that the bill might go to a select committee for further investigation.

The question was then taken on the rising of the Committee, which was carried without a division and leave granted them by the House to sit again.

Thursday, December 18.

Another member, to wit: Andrew Gregg, from Pennsylvania, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

On motion of Mr. Stanton,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before this House a statement of the direct tax, specifying the quotas assigned to each State, and the arrears, if any, of the individual States.

On motion of Mr. Crowninshield,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of erecting buoys and beacons on or near the rocks and shoals in the passages leading to Salem harbor, in the State of Massachusetts.

On motion of Mr. Dawson,

Ordered, That the petition of Robert Peter and others proprietors of squares and lots in the City of Washington, presented to this House on the fourteenth of March last, be referred to Mr. Dawson, Mr. Magruder, and Mr. Van Rensselaer; to examine and report their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. Holmes, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the fifth instant, the petition of Benjamin Sadler, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Darby, from the committee appointed on the eighth instant, presented a bill to incorporate the Trustees of the Baptist Church, in the City of Washington; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution of the Senate appointing a committee, jointly, with a committee to be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, for the purposes expressed in the "Act making a further appropriation for the support of a Library."

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said resolution; and that Mr. Joseph Clay, Mr. Thomas M. Randolph, and Mr. Dana, be appointed a committee on their part.

On motion of Mr. Jeremiah Morrow,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision for the sale of the sections heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress; and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. Dawson, from the committee appointed, on the third instant, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates "to a revision and amendment of the laws for the punishment of crimes against the United States," presented, in part, a bill to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. Jackson,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act of Congress, of the twenty-third of March, one thousand eight hundred and four, as limits the time in which locations of Virginia military warrants shall be made.

Mr. J. Randolph, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the invasion of our territory by the troops of Spain, and to the adoption of measures for the protection thereof, respectfully recommended the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to fortify and defend such position on the Mississippi, below the city of New Orleans, as the President of the United States shall designate for the protection of that city; and that further provision ought to be made by law for guarding the approaches to the same from the East.

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to accept of any company or companies of volunteers, either of artillery, cavalry, or infantry, who may associate and offer themselves for the service, (not exceeding —— thousand men,) who shall be clothed and furnished with horses at their own expense, and armed, and otherwise equipped at the expense of the United States, except such of them as may choose to furnish their own arms, and whose commissioned officers shall be appointed by the respective State and Territorial authorities; who shall be liable to be called upon to do military duty at any time the President shall judge proper, within —— years after he shall accept the same; and when called into actual service and whilst remaining in the same shall be under the same rules and regulations, and be entitled to the same pay, rations, forage, and allowance for clothing, with the regular troops of the United States.

This report, together with the accompanying documents, were referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill prohibiting the importation of slaves.

After a few remarks, from different gentlemen, on the amendment of Mr. Bedinger, and a like provision, suggested by Mr. Early, which he said he would offer in case the former should be negatived, the question was taken on Mr. Bedinger's amendment, which was not agreed to.

Mr. Early said, the fourth section required one or two small amendments. He accordingly moved to add, after the word "color" "unless previously sold, under a sentence of condemnation, by a court having competent jurisdiction." As the bill stood, there might be some doubt, whether the forfeiture would not attach to a sale subsequent to that consequent on condemnation.

Mr. Bidwell said, in case the Committee should disagree to this amendment, he would move to strike out that part of the section which declared that persons of color, imported into the United States, should be forfeited.

The debate that ensued turned principally on the expediency of agreeing to this amendment, which was supported by Mr. Bidwell, and opposed by Mr. Early.

Mr. Bidwell observed, that there were strong objections against the forfeiture of persons of color imported into the United States. As the bill stood, the forfeiture was to be followed by a sale of these persons, as property, as slaves. On this point there was a great diversity in the laws and habits of the respective States; to avoid an interference with which, it appeared to him most advisable to do away the forfeiture, leaving their disposition to the provisions of the laws of the several States. If this part of the section should be struck out, those laws would operate on this point.

There would, he said, be a serious difficulty in adopting the principle of forfeiture accompanied with a sale. In some of the States, the idea of such a species of property was excluded by their constitutions; in those States there could be no such thing as a slave. It was true, that the constitutions and laws of such States did not go the length of interfering with the laws of other States, where slavery was permitted. If fugitives from them sought an asylum in the State of Massachusetts, for instance, they were faithfully restored, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Neither did the laws of Massachusetts interfere with travellers passing through it with slaves; but so far as it respected persons coming to reside in the State, they were manumitted, as a matter of course. He believed that no contract for their sale within the State would be of any validity; nor did he believe any power had been given to the United States to render such sale valid. If there were such a power, its tendency would be to introduce into that State persons contrary to its laws. If such a sale were valid, it would interfere with those laws; and if not valid, it would be a perfect nullity, and the provision be thus altogether inoperative. It was admitted that there was no probability of such an importation into States where slavery was not allowed; yet such a thing might take place, and Congress ought not to legislate under the idea that it would not take place. Mr. B. said, he also felt repugnant to this provision, because it gave to the United States the price of this species of plunder; and carried it into the public Treasury—thus substituting the United States in the place of the first owners. His wish was, that the United States should themselves decline giving their legal sanction to any such sale, by leaving the business altogether to the several State authorities. This difficulty might be entirely avoided by striking out the forfeiture of persons, confining the penalty to a forfeiture of the ships, and imposing a fine on the owners. If this part of the bill should be struck out, other measures of prevention, in case they should be thought necessary, might be provided.

Mr. Early observed that this motion could only be viewed as an old thing offered in a new shape, intended to have the same effect as the motion offered the preceding day declaring persons of color imported into the United States free. He thought it betrayed great inconsistency. Those who advocated it had yesterday supported an amendment which, by declaring all such persons free, went directly to interfere with the laws of States where slavery was permitted; to-day they gravely maintained the inexpediency of any such interference whatever. The great difficulty insisted upon was, that the operation of this law in States where slavery was not permitted would contravene the existing laws by forfeiting the imported slaves. But this difficulty had no solidity in it—it was altogether ideal, as from the nature of things the case of an importation in such States could not occur; at all events, it was among the most improbable events in nature. It could not, therefore, be conceived that the present opposition to this provision of the bill was founded on the avowed ground; it must be bottomed on some other. As to the assumption that it would be an infraction of principle on the part of the United States to be concerned in any act which would involve a transfer of this description of persons, how did gentlemen who felt these scruples reconcile their objections with the act imposing a direct tax, in the collection of which slaves were considered as property, and were sold for its satisfaction in cases of default? How could they get over the difficulty which arose from the execution of laws imposing fines and penalties in the Southern States, under which slaves were sold as property? If it were still said that this was a violation of principle, it must be allowed that it was a violation which had been practised from the infancy of the Government.

Mr. E. concluded by observing that he had no objection so to modify the bill as to get over this ideal objection, to do which he had penned an amendment, the purport of which was so to alter the bill as to provide that the owner and master of ships in which slaves should be imported should each pay —— dollars, and that such ships should be forfeited in States not permitting slavery.

On agreeing to this amendment, the House divided—yeas 33, nays 42.

Mr. Bidwell moved to strike out all that part of the fourth section which related to the forfeiture of negroes.

Mr. Early asked, what substitute was intended.

Mr. Bidwell replied, that he should move that the Committee rise, and that the bill be recommitted.

Mr. Quincy, of Massachusetts.—I am opposed to the motion of my colleague, (Mr. Bidwell,) to strike out the forfeiture. The United States ought to retain the control of them. What is to be done with them, is another question. But for the United States to divest the old owners of their right, and provide no means for their protection afterwards, appears to me cruel and dangerous. They are helpless, ignorant of our laws, and of our language and manners. How are they to be supported? If imported into the South, they will be slaves; if into the North, vagabonds. My colleague ought to show what is to be done with them. I am not prepared with a plan, but I should suppose that they might be disposed of in service, in such States as would admit them, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. If forfeited to the United States, we can, by a general provision, do what we please with them. And I have no doubt that what we do will be both prudent and humane.

Mr. D. R. Williams.—I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, who spoke last, that the amendment ought not to be adopted. It is incumbent on the gentleman who introduced it, (Mr. Bidwell,) to tell us what is to be done with these negroes, if they are not to be forfeited. I say, it is his duty to inform us how they are to be disposed of. Give up the idea of forfeiture, and I challenge the gentleman to invent fines, penalties, or punishments of any sort, sufficient to restrain the slave trade. The same identical persons will break this law who have broken the act of 1794. And who are these persons? They are the gentleman's own countrymen; they are the people of Rhode Island, who are concerned in this business. You cannot stop the trade by penalties. I have myself seen a ship of more than three hundred tons, the George Washington, sold for five dollars. Nobody would bid. The gentleman over the way shakes his head; he acknowledges the truth of my remarks on his countrymen.

You have got, gentlemen, into a great difficulty. You are completely hobbled. It is so bad that you cannot go on, and you must stick where you are. Let me ask, what is the usual conduct of Legislatures on local subjects? Do they not inquire of those who are informed? Are they not guided by those who are competent to judge?

The gentlemen from the South, who understand this subject, tell you how this business must be done. But the gentlemen over the way seem anxious now, as on a former occasion, to draw a revenue from the blood and sweat of the miserable Africans. I will not say that this is their motive, but their conduct certainly justifies a suspicion, that their object is to pass such a law as will connive at the continuance of the trade, for the emoluments of their constituents.

Mr. Bidwell knew nothing of the New England men being concerned in this trade. He lived in the interior of the country, and had little acquaintance with mercantile men. If they were concerned, he was willing that they should be punished by fine and penalties, and to any extent; but he was still opposed to a forfeiture of the negroes generally by a law of Congress. The States may determine, perhaps, whether it shall be done.

Mr. Quincy, of Massachusetts.—I think I now understand the plan of my colleague, (Mr. Bidwell,) and I like it less than before. It is "to leave them to the operation of the laws of the respective States." This is only another form of expression of leaving them to be slaves. It is leaving the title of these persons according to the laws of the State into which they are imported. Is the gentleman sure this will not be an encouragement? It certainly will be, if the importer can find means to evade the penalty of the act; for there he has all the advantage of a market enhanced by our ineffectual attempt to prohibit. If he relies upon the penalty, I have no doubt it will be evaded. Persons without responsibility will be made captains of these ships, or other means devised to escape the penalty, and as his property is, by this amendment, secured to the owner, great profits will result from the traffic.

Mr. Sloan, of New Jersey.—I am opposed to the amendment which the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Early) is anxious to introduce into the bill. I shall beg leave to drop a few sentiments on this subject that will go to the general issue. I shall say nothing of the morality or immorality of these, in the condition of this traffic. None but the Southern gentlemen have touched on this point. I hope that all of us are disposed to make this law effectual, and I trust that such an everlasting stigma will not be left on Congress, as it must be, if we leave these poor creatures in a miserable helpless condition.

I will drop a few words on the subject of yesterday's debate, respecting the forfeiture of negroes. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Early) attempted to terrify the Committee, by making a dreadful picture of the people's rising en masse. But I hope Congress will not leave the poor and needy, the dumb and the lame, and those who cannot plead their own cause, in the miserable condition gentlemen have described.

Mr. Kelly, of Pennsylvania, would not vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Bidwell,) until he knew what was to be substituted. Besides, if the amendment prevailed, it would interfere with the second section of the bill, and that must also be struck out.

Mr. Alston spoke a few words.

Mr. Early.—I did suppose that the United States would pass a law themselves, as soon as they had the power, to prohibit the slave trade effectually. But the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Bidwell) proposes that Congress shall relinquish all the credit of this measure, and resign it up to the States. This, I hope and trust, Congress will never agree to.

If the amendment prevails, I tell you that slaves will continue to be imported as heretofore. I tell the gentleman from Massachusetts, what every man in the Southern States knows already, that slaves will continue to be imported, unless you forfeit them. You cannot get hold of the ships employed in this traffic. Besides, slaves will be brought into Georgia from East Florida. They will be brought into the Mississippi Territory from the bay of Mobile. You cannot inflict any other penalty, or devise any other adequate means of prevention, than a forfeiture of the Africans in whose possession they may be found after importation. I tell you this is the only effectual method. I implore Congress to look seriously on this subject. I implore them, if they do anything, to pass a law which will not disgrace themselves.

Mr. Pitkin, of Connecticut.—Mr. Chairman, I rise, sir, for the purpose of making a motion, which, I trust, will supersede the one now before the Committee. It is, that the Committee should rise, and that the bill before them be referred to a select committee. Under this motion, I presume it will be in order to state my reasons, generally, without being confined to the question of amending the fourth section of the bill, which is now before the Committee.

In my apprehension, sir, there are material defects, not only in the fourth section, but in other parts of this bill, and that amendments can be made with greater convenience and with more correctness in a select committee, than in the Committee of the Whole.

As an amendment to the fourth section has been moved, I shall beg the indulgence of the Committee, while I, in the first place, state my objections to this part of the bill. This section provides:

"That if any negro, mulatto, or person of color, the importation or bringing of whom is by this act prohibited, shall, after the 31st day of December, aforesaid, be found within the United States, or the territories thereof, every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, shall be forfeited."

As the persons thus brought into the country contrary to law, are to be "forfeited," they are to be proceeded with, as appears, by a subsequent section of the bill, "in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage."

What, sir, is this process? They are to be seized by the revenue officers as goods, wares, and merchandise, imported contrary to law. They are to be libelled in the federal courts, are to be condemned, and then sold to the highest bidder by an officer of the court at public auction, and one half of the avails, at least, is to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. This, sir, is a proposition, this is a mode of proceeding against those persons, to which I cannot bring my mind to consent, unless absolute necessity should require it. What, sir, shall we, in a law made for the express purpose of preventing the slave trade, declare that these unfortunate blacks, brought into this country, not only against their own will, but against the express provisions of the law itself, shall be sold as slaves for the benefit of the United States, and the price of their slavery be lodged in the public coffers? I trust not, sir; I believe some other mode may be devised to prevent the slave trade. While I am unwilling to give my assent to this mode of disposing of them, I am free to confess that I feel the force of the remarks made by the Southern gentlemen, that, unless some care should be taken of them after they are landed, the property, and perhaps the lives of those who live in States where slavery is permitted, would be insecure. And here, sir, I would suggest, whether, instead of selling those unfortunate beings as slaves, provision might not be made, that they should be disposed of for a term of years; say seven, eight or ten years, until they should be able to support themselves, and at the end of the term they should be free. If Congress have power to prohibit their importation, they certainly have power to say, that the importer shall have no right or claim whatever in them; and also to declare what shall be their state and condition when imported. Indeed, sir, Congress have already determined this principle in May, 1800. They passed an act, in addition to an act, entitled "An act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States, with any foreign place or country."

By the fourth section of this act, the commissioned vessels of the United States are authorized to seize and take any vessel employed in carrying on the slave trade with foreign countries, and in the same section it is declared, "that all persons 'interested in such vessels, &c., shall be precluded 'from all right or claim to the slaves found on 'board such vessel, and from all damages or retri-'bution, on account thereof." And, I would here ask, whether it is not our duty to protect, and take care of, these unfortunate wretches, who may be thus landed on our shores, destitute of every means, either of protection or support? For the latter clause of the fourth section of this bill is as follows: "And if any person or persons shall be 'concerned in buying or selling such negro, &c., 'every person so concerned, shall forfeit and pay 'five hundred dollars for each negro so bought or 'sold." Thus situated, they must either starve to death, or steal for a subsistence.

And here I cannot but remark, the inconsistency of the clauses in the fourth section. By the first clause, the negroes, &c., are to be forfeited, and, of course, to be sold at public auction; and in another clause, both those who sell and those who buy them, are subject to a penalty of five hundred dollars.

But, sir, the great object of the bill is to prevent the importation of slaves. Let us, in the next place, attend to the provisions in this bill, which are intended to effect this object. The second section is:

"That, if any person or persons shall, after the 31st day of December aforesaid, build, equip, fit, load, or in any wise prepare, or shall engage or be concerned in preparing, &c., any ship or vessel, in any port or place within the jurisdiction or limits of the United States, for the purpose of employing such ship or vessel in importing any negro, &c., every such person shall forfeit and pay, &c., and such ship or vessel, shall be forfeited."

The penalties and forfeitures in this section are limited and restricted solely to vessels prepared, fitted, &c., "in any port or place within the jurisdictional limits of the Governmont of the United States." How easy will it be to evade the penalty of this section, by preparing or fitting vessels in a foreign port or place? And, sir, if the statement, just now made, by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Alston,) be correct, it will not be more difficult to avoid the penalties and forfeitures of the third section. That gentleman has stated that it would be very easy for a vessel, in the course of an hour or two, to land a cargo of negroes on some one of the numerous islands along the Southern coast, and be off. If so, this part of the bill must be very inefficient, indeed. It says:

"That, if any ship or vessel, laden in whole or in part, with persons, the importation or bringing of whom is, by this act, prohibited, shall, after the 31st day of December, aforesaid, be found in any river, port, or bay, or harbor, within the United States, or the territories thereof, or anywhere on the high seas, within the jurisdictional limits of the Government of the United States, such ship or vessel, together with her cargo, &c., shall be forfeited, and the owner and master, &c., forfeit and pay —— dollars."

Now, sir, according to this section, no vessel is forfeited, nor is the owner or master liable to a penalty, unless she is actually found within the jurisdictional limits of the Government of the United States. And here a very serious question may arise, how far, on the high seas, the jurisdictional limits of our Government extend; on this subject there is a diversity of opinion. Some contend that it extends but a marine league, or three miles from the shores, as the shores run; others, three miles beyond a line drawn from headland to headland; others extend it still further—the question is not yet finally settled in this country. But, sir, would it not be easy for a vessel to unlade her cargo by the means of lighters and boats, at a place clearly beyond our jurisdictional limits? In which case, she would not be liable to a forfeiture. In addition to this, the vessel must not only be "found" within our limits, but she must be "found laden in whole or in part, with persons, the importation or bringing of whom is by this act prohibited;" otherwise the forfeiture is not incurred, nor can any penalty be exacted from the owner or master. Thus, sir, for aught that is contained in this section, a vessel may unload just within our limits, and afterwards enter our ports in safety, or she can come within our limits, and if she can unload her cargo before she is found or seized, she will escape the forfeiture. These two sections, and the second and third, contain all the penal clauses in the bill; and I would submit it to the consideration of the Committee, whether it will not be necessary to add some further clauses more highly penal, if we really intend to prohibit this infamous traffic. Perhaps we may insert some of the provisions contained in the present laws against the slave trade, between the United States and foreign countries: That the owner or master of every vessel clearing for the coast of Africa, or suspected to be intended for the slave trade, shall give bond, that no slave shall be taken on board of his vessel, to be transported to this country; and provide, likewise, that the owner or master should forfeit and pay a certain sum for every slave he should put on board. I would go further, and say, that every person who should land a slave on our shores, should not only forfeit all his property, but should suffer the punishment of imprisonment.

For these reasons, sir, I hope the Committee will rise, and that the business will be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Early.—In answer to the gentleman from Connecticut, I will acknowledge that there is an inconsistency in this bill. But it seems very wonderful that the gentleman has at last found it out. I offered an amendment, a short time since, in order to obviate this inconsistency; but, unless I am much mistaken, that very gentleman voted against it.

In the name of all the friends of this bill, I offer my most grateful acknowledgments to the gentleman for proving, in the most incontestable manner, the absolute necessity of that very provision in the bill which he opposes. He has shown, most undeniably, that you must forfeit the negroes, that you cannot possibly get at the vessel or the captain, to operate on them. In the name of common sense, I ask you, then, what can you find to operate on, but the negroes imported? and yet, with these truths staring them in the face, gentlemen are opposed to the measure. I wish the gentleman from Connecticut, from the immensity of the resources which he has displayed on this subject, would tell us what, beside the negroes, can be found for the law to operate upon.

I am willing that the Committee rise, but not for the purpose mentioned. The gentleman moves you to rise, and refer the bill to a select committee; and for what? To determine the principle of the bill; not to specify the detail. What can the select committee report? Unless instructions are given them, they must report the same bill, and then you will be just where you are now.

Mr. Bidwell thought it was premature to refer the subject to a select committee.

Mr. Pitkin.—I beg leave, Mr. Chairman, to explain myself. I am sorry I was so unfortunate as to be misunderstood by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Early.) He has stated that the objections which I made on the fourth section of the bill, were inconsistent with the vote I gave on the amendment to the same section, which he had proposed; and that, in case his amendment had been adopted, the difficulties which I had mentioned would have been removed. I trust, sir, I shall be able to satisfy the Committee, that no such inconsisteney can be imputed to me. What was the amendment proposed? It was, in substance, that the negroes, "if they had not been condemned before by a court having jurisdiction of the same," should be forfeited. I voted against the amendment, because I conceived it wholly unnecessary, as no one would suppose they could be condemned twice; and, also, because I was opposed to that part of the section which was proposed to be amended. But how this amendment, if adopted, would have obviated my objections to the inconsistency of the two clauses in this section, is difficult for me to conceive. If the amendment had been adopted, the negroes were to be forfeited, once at least, and of course to be sold; but, by the last clause, no one could either buy or sell, without being liable to a heavy penalty.

As to this section in general, I did say, what I again repeat, sir, that unless absolutely necessary, I never would consent that those unfortunate blacks should be sold at auction, by the United States, in the same manner as they would sell a bale of goods.

The gentleman from Georgia has likewise said, that I have proved, conclusively, that the section must be retained, and the negroes must be sold, because I have declared, that the other parts of the bill are insufficient to prevent the importation of slaves. I leave the Committee to judge whether this is a just inference. I have endeavored to satisfy the Committee that the second and third sections of the bill are so limited in their provisions, that the penalties may be so easily evaded, that the object intended by the law, will not be enforced.

But, sir, if I have succeeded in this, if I have proved the inefficiency of the present bill to answer the important object we have in view, that is, to prevent the importation of the people of color into the United States, does it follow, that we must retain a section, which says, that the importer shall not make slaves of them, but that the United States will make slaves of them themselves? I should suppose that the just inference would be, that we ought to insert clauses which would be more efficient, and that, for this purpose, the bill ought to be referred to a select committee.

The question being taken on the Committee's rising, it was carried—ayes 72.

Mr. Pitkin hoped they would not have leave to sit again.

Mr. Sloan.—Notwithstanding the very high respect I entertain for the gentleman who reported this bill, I think it is easier to make an entire new one, than to undertake to amend this, so that it will answer.

The question being taken on the Committee having leave to sit again, it was lost—ayes 45, noes 57.

The bill was then recommitted to a committee of seven, consisting of Messrs. Early, T. M. Randolph, Kelly, J. Campbell, Kenan, Cooke, and Van Rensellaer.

Mr. Smilie invited the attention of the House to the introduction of a new principle into the bill—a principle which, in his opinion, involved the reputation of the country. In looking over the bill, he had been struck with surprise to find no penalty attached to one of the highest crimes man could commit. He believed there was not a State in the Union that did not inflict the punishment of death on wilful murder. A captain of a ship engaged in this traffic was guilty of murder.

Mr. S. said he was well aware of the propriety of proportioning punishments to crimes. In this instance, he thought, by annexing death to the perpetration of this crime, this proportion would not be violated. He did also believe that the people of the United States viewed the subject in the same light. He was certain those of the State in which he lived did. Under this impression, he would offer for the consideration of the select committee a new section, prescribing that if any person should take any negro or mulatto, without their consent, with an intent to sell them as slaves, and transport them into any place within the jurisdiction of the United States, they should be considered as guilty of felony, and on being convicted, suffer death.

The Speaker observed that it was not at present in order to receive this motion, unless in the shape of an instruction to the committee to whom the bill had been recommitted.

Mr. Smilie said, as the hour was late, he would withdraw the motion for the present, and take occasion to renew it on a future day.

Friday, December 19.

Another member, to wit: Abram Trigg, from Virginia, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. Boyd, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill to revive and continue in force, an act, entitled "An act for the relief of the refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. Early, from the committee to whom was yesterday recommitted the bill to prohibit the importation or bringing of slaves into the United States, or the Territories thereof, after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven, reported an amendatory bill with the same title; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of St. Mary; and, after some time spent therein the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

REFINED SUGAR.

Mr. Crowninshield, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, made a report on the petitions of sundry inhabitants of Philadelphia and Baltimore, praying for a drawback of duties on refined sugar exported.

The report states that the subject was fully examined by the committee in the last Congress, to which report they refer for their reasons against granting the prayer of the petitions, concluding with a resolution, declaring it inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.—Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday.

Mr. Crowninshield then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce the duties on foreign refined sugar and sugar candy, from and after the —— day of —— next, and that all restriction at present imposed on the importation and exportation of refined sugar be removed.

Mr. Crowninshield remarked that the duties at present paid on the importation of these articles were exceedingly high, and operated as a monopoly to domestic sugar refiners. He was opposed to any such monopoly, and to such exorbitant duties. His object was to call the attention of the House to the subject—for which purpose he moved the reference of his resolution to the same committee with that to which the report had been referred, in which motion the House concurred.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

On motion of Mr. Bidwell the consideration of the bill "to revive and make permanent an act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses, and in addition to the same," was resumed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. J. Clay offered two new sections, in conformity with the intimation made by him when the bill was before under consideration, the purport of which was—

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if, on due examination made according to the provisions of this act, and of the act hereby revived and made permanent, it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the magistrate before whom the examination shall have been had, that at any election by ballot for any member or members of the House of Representatives, any person or persons shall have voted who may not at the time of such election be legally entitled to vote, the person or persons so having voted shall be examined upon oath or affirmation touching the candidate or candidates for whom they may have voted. And the said magistrate shall have like powers to summon and compel such person or persons so voting as aforesaid, to attend, as are provided by the act revived and made permanent by this act, and under like penalties, and with like allowances for attendance and travelling as other witnesses. And it shall be the duty of the said magistrate to reduce the examination of the person or persons so illegally voting, to writing; and to transmit it, duly certified with the other testimony touching the case, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, for the time being. And if any such person, or any other witness, summoned to attend as aforesaid, shall refuse to answer, such person or witness, so refusing, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding twenty dollars, to be recovered in like manner as other penalties or fines imposed by the aforesaid act.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That no testimony or examination, taken in pursuance of any of the provisions of this act, or of the act revived and made permanent by this act, shall ever be given as evidence in any court of law or equity, in support of any action of debt, damage, or trespass, or in any criminal prosecution against any person or persons so examined, excepting in actions of debt for the recovery of fines and penalties imposed by this and the aforesaid act."

On these provisions a debate of some length arose. Messrs. J. Clay, Elliot, Smilie, and Findley, supported, and Messrs. Varnum, Bidwell, and Sloan, opposed the amendments.

By the former gentlemen it was observed, that the provisions submitted were offered for the purpose of preserving sacred the right of election; that, under the existing provisions of law, it was frequently necessary, in the case of a number of bad votes being given, either to confine the returns, where there was great appearance of fraud, or to set aside the election altogether and order a new one. This was a great grievance, that loudly called for redress, if any means could be devised for affording it. It was added that a similar provision had been adopted in the State of Pennsylvania, and had been carried into effect without inconvenience; and that even if it should be acknowledged that it would be attended with some inconveniences, it did not follow that it was not freer from objection than any other provision which could be devised.

On the other hand it was contended, that the right of ballot was justly considered sacred, and that whatever tended to impair it ought to be resisted; that, in this instance, although nominally the power given to the magistrate only applied to persons not legally qualified to vote, it virtually gave him the right of determining who were or were not so qualified. On this point the magistrate was liable to misjudgment, and might consequently compel a qualified voter to declare for whom he voted, and thus destroy the sacredness of the ballot. Nor was it uncharitable to suppose, that in addition to the mistakes of the magistrate, party spirit might in some instances carry him beyond the bounds of propriety. It was besides a strong objection to the proposed provision, that it made the issue of an election depend on the oaths of persons who had previously committed a fraud by giving illegal votes.

After this discussion the Committee, without coming to any decision, rose and asked leave to sit again, which was refused, and the bill recommitted to Messrs. Bidwell, Halsey, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Pitkin, R. Nelson, and McFarland.

Monday, December 22.

The Speaker informed the House that he had received a letter, addressed to the House, from Isaac Williams, a deranged man, and the same person who had communicated an address to the House at the last session, on which no order was taken.

On motion of Mr. Marmaduke Williams,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending the power of granting injunctions to the judges of the district courts of the United States; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise; and a committee was appointed, of Mr. Marmaduke Williams, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Ellis, Mr. Sandford, Mr. Masters, Mr. Kelly, and Mr. Fisk.

Mr. Van Cortlandt, presented to the House a petition of the President, Directors, and Company of the Highland Turnpike, in the State of New York, which was received and read, praying the aid of Congress to enable the said company to complete the turnpike road from Kingsbridge, on the east side of Hudson river, across the Highlands to the city of Hudson, in the said State of New York.—Referred to Mr. Van Cortlandt, Mr. Southard, Mr. Varnum, Mr. Trigg, and Mr. Rhea, of Tennessee; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia;" and, after some time spent therein the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

Ordered, That the representation of George Gilpin, and William H. Dorsey, Judges of the Orphans' Court of the counties of Alexandria and Washington, in the District of Columbia, presented to this House on the seventh of January, 1804, be referred to Mr. John Randolph, Mr. Covington, and Mr. Porter; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter, directed to them, from Charles Bruce, representing that the Postmaster General had given a contract to another person for a higher sum than that bid by him, and implicating a member of the House in the transaction.

Some conversation ensued on the disposition of these papers.

Mr. Elliot was of opinion that, considering their nature and the mode of presentation, no notice ought to be taken of them.

Mr. Alston said he had seen Bruce in North Carolina, who was there using language similar to that contained in the letter. When he came to this place he had made inquiry on the subject, of the proper officer, and had learned that Bruce had previously been a contractor, and had failed in several contracts—and that it was for this reason that his proposals had not been accepted.

Mr. Early called for the reading of the documents, from which it would appear that one of Bruce's own sons, who had been a contractor, had robbed the mail. Mr. E. added that he knew this to be a fact, and that the man was now in jail suffering for the crime.

Mr. Bidwell moved that the communication should be referred to the Post Office Committee.

Mr. D. R. Williams opposed the motion, which was lost without a division. No further order was taken on the subject.

EXPLORATION OF WESTERN WATERS.

Mr. Alston, from the Committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the farther exploring of the western waters, made the following report:

That considerable information has already been derived from those expeditions which have taken place, under the direction of the President of the United States, in exploring the western waters. The river Missouri, has, by Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, been traced nearly to its source; the Mississippi, by Lieutenant Pike, to its source; and the Red River, by Mr. Freeman, about six hundred miles from its mouth, nearly as far as the French settlements extended.

The important surveys made by Messrs. Lewis, Clarke, and Freeman, in addition to those before made, furnish materials for commencing an accurate map of the Mississippi and its western waters; some principal rivers, however, remain still to be explored. The ridges or mountains from which the sources of these rivers spring, in a great measure form the exterior boundary of the newly acquired territory of the United States on the west side of the Mississippi. It therefore makes it the more important that the work commenced of exploring the western waters should be carried on and finally completed.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of $ —— be annually appropriated for the term of —— years, for the purpose of enabling the President of the United States further to explore the western waters of the United States.

Referred to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

DEFENCE OF NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. Clinton, of New York, presented several petitions from the inhabitants of New York, praying that the city may be adequately fortified.

[Note.—These petitions were alike, being signed only by different petitioners.]

Mr. Clinton moved that they be printed. On dividing the House, the motion was lost.

Mr. Thomas, of New York, called for the reading of the petitions. As the House had decided that they should not be printed, it was proper the members should hear them read. This motion was carried.

The Clerk had read a few sentences only, when Mr. Thomas called for order. There was so much noise and disturbance in the House, he could not hear the Clerk read. The Speaker having restored order, the Clerk finished the reading of the petitions.

Mr. Varnum, of Massachusetts, rose to inquire by whom the petitions were signed, whether by the Corporation of New York, or by individuals.

The Speaker replied, that they were signed by individuals only.

Mr. Varnum then moved that the petitions be printed, in order that the public might know who were the persons that had signed the petitions.

The Speaker observed, that a motion for printing the petitions was not in order, as the House had already decided that question. It might, however, be done, if a motion to reconsider that vote should be made and carried.

Mr. Varnum then moved to reconsider the vote already passed. It being carried—ayes 53, noes 43, Mr. V. then renewed his motion for printing, which was seconded by Mr. Quincy, who remarked that he understood the motion to be that the names of all the signers be printed.

Mr. Smilie, of Pennsylvania, believed that such a thing had never been done before.

Mr. DANA, of Connecticut, called for a division of the question.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD inquired, if the signers were numerous. If they were, the printing would be expensive.

The SPEAKER replied, that they were very numerous.

Mr. SMILIE thought, if the House agreed to printing the names, the precedent would be very inconvenient.

Mr. BIDWELL, of Massachusetts, expressed his opinion in favor of printing.

Mr. DANA objected to printing the names. The object of the memorial is of general importance; and if the facts stated are true, and the arguments solid, it makes no difference whether there are few or many petitioners.

Mr. QUINCY concurred in sentiment with the gentleman from Connecticut. If, therefore, the original motion, included the names, he would wish not to be understood as seconding it. He would withdraw.

Mr. ELLIOT, of Vermont, hoped the names would be printed. He wished that the name of every man in the Union, who is willing to defend his country in this alarming crisis, could be printed. He wished that the yeas and nays, on the question of defence, could be taken throughout the seventeen States.

Mr. GREGG, of Pennsylvania.—According to the motion of the gentleman from Vermont, every man's name in the Union must be printed, as all are willing and ready to defend their country when necessary. He had no objection but the expense, though it was contrary to the usual mode of doing business.

Mr. THOMAS was against printing the names. Few of the subscribers were known to any members of the House.

The SPEAKER rose to state the question, when Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, began to speak. The SPEAKER said, he would state the question, if the gentleman from North Carolina would permit him. He understood the motion to be, that the petition, with the names of the subscribers, be printed.

Mr. ALSTON understood the question differently from the SPEAKER. He concurred in sentiment with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. GREGG.) in the impropriety of printing.

Mr. SMILIE understood the motion to be, that the petition be printed without the names, and that the amendment proposed was to print the names also.

The SPEAKER declared himself willing to be corrected, if he had mistaken the motion.

Mr. VARNUM said, he moved for the printing of the petitions generally. That motion would not comprehend the names. This was his view of the subject.

Mr. QUINCY understood his colleague otherwise. He (Mr. VARNUM) had certainly said that he wished the petition printed, in order that the public might know who had signed them.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS inquired if the motion to print the names was withdrawn. If it was, he would renew it. He wished all the information on the subject he could obtain, and for that reason, he wished the names of the petitioners published. The printing of the petition could furnish no new information, for it had been already printed all over the continent before it was presented to Congress. This Mr. W. thought very unfair and indecorous, in the petitioners. He concluded, by moving that the motion be amended so as to comprehend the printing of the names.

Mr. VARNUM agreed that his colleague (Mr. QUINCY) had correctly stated his observations. He had, indeed, expressed a wish that it might be known who were the petitioners.

Mr. DANA was opposed to printing the names, but was solicitous that the petition might be printed. It would be convenient for the members to have it on their desks to refer to. Mr. D. conceived that the petitioners did not deserve the imputation of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS.) The petitions had been distributed in all the wards of New York for signers, and the publication of them could not be prevented.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS, to print the names of the petitioners, it was lost—ayes 11. The question was then taken on the motion to print the petitions, which was also lost—ayes 46, noes 60.

MANHATTAN COMPANY.

Mr. CLINTON presented a petition from the President and Directors of the Manhattan Company in New York. The petition states that the law which directs that custom-house bonds shall be exclusively deposited in the United States Bank, affects their interests very injuriously; that the monthly deposits at New York amount, on an average, to $250,000. That the merchants dealing at the Manhattan bank, make in Manhattan notes large payments on account of custom-house bonds into the United States Bank, which, by means of their notes, draws largely on the Manhattan bank for specie; that, by these and similar means, the United States Bank regulate the discount, and contract the business of all the other banking institutions in the city. That the reasons which once existed for giving the United States Bank a preference, have since ceased, by the sale of the public stock. But the stockholders in the United States Bank are now almost entirely foreigners, which circumstance is favorable to the erection of foreign influence in this country, and ought to excite alarm.

Mr. C. said that as the subject related to the revenue, he moved the reference of the petition to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD thought that the subject had no connexion with the revenue. In his opinion, however, the petitioners stated very strong reasons in support of their petition. They also seem to intimate a wish that they should be allowed a share in the deposits, which Mr. C. thought no more than reasonable. He concluded, by moving a reference of the petition to a select committee.

Mr. C. withdrew his motion that the petition be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. —— immediately renewed it.

Mr. QUINCY was personally indifferent whether the petition was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, but, as the subject manifestly affected the revenue, it was proper to refer it to that Committee. It was a question very material to the revenue, whether the custom-house bonds should be deposited in the United States Bank. The contrary supposition implies that all banks are solid and secure.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD conceived that the subject of the petition had no more relation to the Committee of Ways and Means than to that of Commerce and Manufactures, or any other standing committee of the House. Its object was, to procure relief against an injurious monopoly, possessed by a particular banking company. It neither proposed to give or take away one shilling of the public money. The Committee of Ways and Means were already pressed with a great deal of matter. Mr. C. did not wish to trouble the House with the United States Bank, but more than sixteen years they had enjoyed an exclusive monopoly, which has been very injurious to all other banking institutions, as has been very properly detailed in the petition. He meant to propose a plan for equalising the benefits of the deposits. This is a subject which deeply interested the constituents of his colleague, (Mr. QUINCY.) The merchants of Boston cannot procure any large sums except from the United States Bank, which controls all the other banks in that town.

The SPEAKER informed Mr. CROWNINSHIELD that it was improper to speak of any gentleman's district.

Mr. QUINCY observed, that all subjects relating to the revenue properly belonged to the Committee of Ways and Means. The present subject deeply implicates the revenue, because it all depends upon being safely deposited. His colleague seemed to have a great fellow-feeling for the Committee of Ways and Means, and appeared to be anxious lest they should be pressed with too much business; but that committee had sufficient time to consider all the business referred to them.

The question being taken on referring the petition to the Committee of Ways and Means, it was lost—ayes 32. It was then referred to a select committee of nine.

TUESDAY, December 23.

Another member to wit: EDWIN GRAY, from Virginia, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing the report and transcripts of decisions made by the Commissioners appointed to examine the claims to land in the district of Vincennes, in conformity with the several acts making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Indiana Territory; which were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the amount of deposits of the public money in the United States and other banks for the last three years; together with a table showing the balances in favor of the United States, remaining in the said banks, respectively, for that period, distinguishing the amount in each year; which were read, and referred to the committee appointed yesterday on the petition of the President and Directors of the Manhattan Company, of the City of New York.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before you accounts of the sums which have been expended by the United States on the Capitol, the President's House, the Public Offices, the Navy Yard, and the Marine Barracks, respectively; and the amount expended on other objects of public expense within the City of Washington, as requested by your resolution of the fifteenth instant.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 23, 1806.

The Message was read, and, together with the documents accompanying the same, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the seventeenth instant, the petition of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Alexandria and Washington, in the District of Columbia, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

Mr. MAGRUDER, from the committee appointed on the seventeenth instant, presented a bill authorizing the discharge of William Hearn, from his imprisonment; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and seven; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the same committee, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and seven; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Mr. ELLIOT rose for the purpose of offering the resolutions of which he had given previous notice. He said he should not on this occasion avail himself of the ordinary indulgence of the House so liberally accorded to members who made long speeches on short resolutions. If the resolutions should be seconded, he would briefly state their general object, and then move their reference to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and if so referred, he would on a future day (for the state of his health did not admit of it on this day) assign at length his reasons for them.

Mr. Elliot then offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to make provision by law for the further and more effectual protection of the commerce, the seamen, the harbors, the coasts, and the frontiers of the United States.

2. Resolved, That, for the great purposes of national protection and defence, it is expedient to provide, by law, for repairing, manning, and supporting in actual service, the whole of the frigates and smaller vessels of war belonging to the United States.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law, for defraying the expenses incident to building two new frigates, to supply the places of the Philadelphia, which was lost during the late war with Tripoli, and the General Greene, which has been condemned as unfit for service.

4. Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for preparing two or more navy yards, and navy arsenals, situated on or near the margin of the ocean, for the reception of ships and vessels of war, and for other naval purposes.

5. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire what provision it may be necessary to make, by law, in relation to the location, establishment, and superintendence of navy yards and naval arsenals, and that the said committee report by bill, or otherwise.

6. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire what further measures are necessary for the protection of American seamen, and for their release and indemnification when impressed into foreign service by the officers or subjects of foreign Powers, and that the said committee report by bill, or otherwise.

7. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the situation of the fortifications of the ports and harbors of the United States; into the practicability and propriety of a general system of fortification, and the expense with which it would be attended; and, also, into the best method of fortifying the port of New York, and the other principal ports which are now in a defenceless state, and that the said committee report a statement of facts, with their opinion thereon, to the House.

8. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of investing the President of the United States, by law, with ample powers to cause every aggression and attack upon the rights, the honor, and the interest of the United States, which may be committed or commenced by the officers, citizens, or subjects of any foreign Power, within the ports or harbors of the United States, within the waters under their jurisdiction, and upon the high seas within certain distances of the coast, to be immediately repelled, and effectually chastised, and that the said committee report by bill, or otherwise.

9. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to revise the existing laws respecting the militia; to devise means for completely arming and equipping for actual service, and for more effectually organizing and disciplining the whole of the militia of the United States, in order to render it an efficient force for the protection of the United States from invasion by any foreign Power, and that the said committee report by bill, or otherwise.

The Clerk having read the resolutions, Mr. Elliot moved their reference to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

It was suggested that most, if not all the subjects embraced by these resolutions, had been already referred to committees appointed on the several members of the President's Message, and that consequently a similar reference to other committees would, without any good purpose being attained, tend to complicate the proceedings of the House; and a question of order was raised as to the regularity of committing them.

The Speaker said that as the resolutions, though in some respects similar to the subjects already referred, in other respects varied from them, he considered the motion of reference in order.

Mr. Elliot said a few words to the same effect, and stated his wish to be afforded an opportunity on a future day, should the resolutions be committed, of offering his sentiments at length on the interesting objects embraced by them.

On referring the resolutions to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the House divided—only 32 members rising in the affirmative, the reference was disagreed to, when the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The consideration of the bill prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States was resumed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Early moved to strike out that part of the bill which declares the importation of persons of color into the United States felony, and punishes it with death.

This motion was supported by Messrs. Early and Holland, and opposed by Mr. Smilie, and agreed to—ayes 60, noes 41.

Mr. Bidwell renewed the motion formerly offered by him, so to amend the bill as to prevent the forfeiture of persons of color imported.

On this amendment a debate of considerable length ensued, in which Messrs. Bidwell, Cook, Sloan, Fisk, Bedinger, and Smilie supported, and Messrs. Lloyd, Early, Elmer, Alston, and Macon, opposed it.

The advocates of the motion observed, that when a former bill on this subject was before the House, a motion had been made to amend a section then under consideration, by striking out the forfeiture of persons imported as slaves. Before the question was taken on that amendment, another motion, prior in its nature, was made and carried, that the Committee should rise. The House afterwards recommitted the bill to a select committee, who reported it in the present form. They regretted then, and still regretted, that they did not first settle the principle by a vote which might have been an instruction to the select committee in redraughting the bill. And they thought it their duty, in this stage of the business, to take the sense of the Committee of the Whole on this point. The section under consideration related to a ship or vessel laden in whole or in part with persons, the importation or bringing of whom into the United States was prohibited. If the vessel was found in any of our ports, the owner and master are severally subjected to a pecuniary penalty. But there was no forfeiture of the vessel or cargo, unless found in a harbor of some State whose constitution and laws permitted slavery. In that case, both the vessel and her cargo are to be forfeited, and, by another section of the bill, are to be sold under the authority and for the benefit of the United States. By the very terms of the provision, the cargo will consist in whole or in part of persons whose importation is prohibited—that is, persons unlawfully and forcibly taken by the crew of the slave ship, or somebody whom they may have employed for that purpose. For, in point of legal or moral principle, it made no difference whether the crew of an American slave ship, upon their arrival on the coast of Africa, go ashore themselves, or by surprise or force take possession of their prisoners, or, by the offer of a price, tempt some tribe or party of the natives to make the seizure for them. The crime is the same and the injury the same to the sufferers. In either case they are, without their consent, and against their will, by force and arms, torn from their homes, from their families, their parents, their children, their husbands, and wives, their brothers, friends, and acquaintance, from all those tender relations, which they, as well as we, have hearts to feel. In spite of entreaties, or cries and tears, they are unfeelingly dragged to the shore, hurried on board, crowded into the hold, loaded with chains, and transferred to their native land. Those of them who do not commit suicide through terror or despair, who do not sink beneath the rigor with which they are treated, or fall a prey to the diseases generated by their situation, are brought across the ocean to this country. The moment they arrive in any harbor within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, they are met by this law which we are now passing. It finds them, by the laws of God and man, entitled to their freedom as clearly and absolutely as we are. They are not, by any law, human or divine, the slaves of any master. They are not the lawful property of any owner. They are no more the property of those who hold them in duress than the man who is robbed is the property of the highwayman while in his power. Their detention is a wrongful, false imprisonment. In this very bill we declare it to be a high crime. By the same law we condemn the man-stealer and become the receivers of his stolen goods. We punish the criminal, and then step into his place, and complete the crime which he had only begun. We ourselves do that which we prevent him from doing; that which he had crossed and recrossed the Atlantic, at the hazard of his life and the sacrifice of his character and his conscience, to be enabled to do. We sell his victims as slaves, receive the price of their slavery, and put it into the public treasury; and the vendee holds them and their children, from generation to generation, in perpetual slavery, by a title derived from our law. In short, we assume to ourselves, as a Government, the exclusive right of selling slaves imported into the United States. It is very different from a case alluded to in the debate of a former day—the case of a judgment in favor of the United States against a debtor, on which, if a writ of execution is issued against his goods and chattels, in a State where slaves are considered personal estate, they may be taken and sold as such in satisfaction of the execution. There the process of the United States only operates to transfer from one master to another a title created and existing by the law of the State—a law which ours cannot constitutionally control, and to which it must conform. But when a person of the description referred to in this section is forfeited, as a part of the prohibited cargo, and sold accordingly, the purchaser's title to him as a slave is derived immediately, originally, and solely from the United States. For the honor of the nation, it was hoped their statute books would never be stained with such a provision. The President, in his Message to both Houses of Congress, has congratulated us upon the approach of the time, when, agreeably to the Constitution, we may prohibit the African slave trade. In mentioning it, as a subject of congratulation, he has spoken the language of humanity, of justice, and sound policy, the language and sentiment of the nation. They hoped they should pass the prohibition, which was thus recommended, and share in the honor of passing it. But, ardently as they wished this, they would prefer to pass no prohibitory act; they would rather do nothing at all upon the subject, than adopt a principle which appears so objectionable. They trusted, however, it would not be adopted. To try the sense of the Committee upon the question, it was moved, as an amendment to this section, after the word vessel, in the tenth line, to strike out the words, "if brought into any port or place within a State or Territory, the Constitution and laws of which permit slavery, shall, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture," and, instead thereof, to insert these words, "Shall, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and all her cargo, except persons;" so that the clause may stand thus: "and such ship or vessel shall, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and all her cargo, except persons, be forfeited."

The opponents of the amendment, observed that its advocates had acted the part of a physician who should tell his patient, you are in extreme danger, you have a violent disease, it is necessary to do something. They had portrayed in vivid colors the nefarious nature of this traffic; but had objected to the only practicable mode of arresting it, without even suggesting a substitute for it. When asked what they will do with these people when brought among us, they answer they will not dispose of them in this or that way, but will leave them for future disposition. Some gentlemen had indeed undertaken to strike out a plan for their further disposition, and recommended their deportation; others had objected to this course. Some were for leaving them to the States, to which, too, others were opposed. What was the result of all this, but that gentlemen could not agree among themselves on any other practicable plan than that contained in the bill? What was the natural conclusion, but that this was the only practicable plan that could be devised? The great object was to pass such laws to remedy the evil, as would be carried into effect where the evil existed. There was no difficulty in legislating so far as respected the direct trade of this country. So far, the revenue laws and armed ships would be effectual in prohibiting it. But the great difficulty arose from the indirect trade through the contiguous territories of adjacent Powers. To these points it became necessary to apply the remedy.

What Charleston then was, it was probable that St. Mary's, the Mobile, and Ponchartrain, would become in relation to the slave trade, unless some strong provisions were devised to operate on the direct trade. If this provision were stricken out, it would be necessary to strike out another similar provision, in the next section, for the forfeiture of any slave found in the United States contrary to law; and where then would be the preventive from introducing them into the United States through the Spanish territories? There would be none. The vessel in which they shall be brought cannot be taken, because she will be bound to a Spanish port, and because she will sail under Spanish or Danish colors. The cargo will be landed in the Spanish territories within stone's throw of our own doors. The captain, the owner, and the vessel, will be safe in the Spanish dominions. Their owners will bring them to your line, and sell them with impunity to your citizens, and they will immediately mix among the slaves previously in the country. They demanded to know how, without a forfeiture of the people, their introduction into the United States was to be prevented.

The penalties of twenty thousand and fifty thousand dollars, on the owner and seller, would be a nullity, as they were out of reach. Who then, in such circumstances, could be operated on, but the purchasers? There was the rub—it was their interest alone which, by being operated on, would produce a check. Snap their purse-strings, break open their strong box, deprive them of their slaves, and by destroying the temptation to buy, you put an end to the trade.

But it might be said, if this business is left to the States, they may operate by their laws on the interest of the purchaser. But was it come to this? That Congress were so anxious to put an end to this nefarious trade, and yet were willing to leave its actual destruction to the several States? Could gentlemen insure the adoption of fit regulations by all the States? Were they prepared to rest the business on every State adopting these regulations, when the forbearance of a single State to pass the necessary laws would effectually prevent the redress of the evil?

Some gentlemen appeared to think this evil would be effectually met by commercial and custom-house regulations. But the fact was, that nothing short of a forfeiture of the slave would afford an effectual remedy, the former would be like weaving a cage of cobwebs for a lion, whom nothing short of a cage of iron would confine.

The Committee now rose, without coming to a decision on the amendment; and, on motion, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 24.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the Committee of Elections to whom it was referred to examine the certificates of election, or other credentials, of members returned to serve in this House, made a report, in part, thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee appointed on the eighteenth instant, presented a bill authorizing the proprietors of squares and lots in the City of Washington, to have the same subdivided and admitted to record; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. CLAIBORNE, the petition of Amy Dardin, presented to this House on the 27th of December, 1804, was referred to the committee appointed, on the eleventh instant, "to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, description of claims against the United States are barred by the statutes of limitation, which, in reason and justice, ought to be provided for by law."

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Mr. EARLY called for the order of the day, on the bill prohibiting the importation of slaves.

Mr. FISK hoped the consideration of this bill would be postponed, that the report of the committee on measures for the defence of the frontier might be taken up. He considered it high time to proceed to the consideration of this subject. The chairman of the select committee, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) had been attending for two days, and was now absent, he presumed, in consequence of the feeble state of his health.

Mr. EARLY said he had no disposition to press his motion, in case other more important business required attention. On this point the House would decide for themselves.

Having disagreed to the motion of Mr. EARLY—ayes 20—the House agreed to consider the report of the select committee, called for by Mr. FISK, and went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee to whom was referred, on the third instant, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates "to the invasion of our territories by the troops of Spain, and the adoption of measures for the protection thereof."

The first resolution having been read, as follows:

1. Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to fortify and defend such position on the Mississippi, below the city of New Orleans, as the President of the United States shall designate for the protection of that city; and that further provision ought to be made by law for guarding the approaches to the same from the east;

Mr. FISK observed, that the city of New Orleans was in such a situation as to require some additional fortifications. Those at present erected on the Mississippi were not in the most eligible position to guard the place; and it was also considered necessary that some measures should be taken to guard it against any hostile approaches from the east. Perhaps a small vessel and some gunboats might be requisite, as well as some batteries, the expense of which would not be great.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL observed, that very little need be said on this resolution. He would barely remark, in addition to what had been said by the gentleman from Vermont, that this subject had been considered as having been recommended by the President as proper to be taken up immediately. There was at present no defence of the mouth of the Mississippi below New Orleans. That place was therefore greatly exposed from that quarter, and measures consequently became necessary to guard it against the invasion of a foreign enemy, and from attacks that might be made from our own country, if there existed any persons that had harbored such a design. He understood that some distance above the mouth of the river was contemplated as an eligible situation for fortification, at a point where there had been a fort, but which had gone much to decay. It would either be necessary to repair this fort, or to erect another. He had also been informed that it was practicable for vessels of some burden to make an attack on New Orleans from the lakes, and thence the necessity of guarding the place against any attack from the east.

The question was then put, and the resolution agreed to without a division.

The second resolution was then read as follows:

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to accept of any company or companies, of volunteers, either artillery, cavalry, or infantry, who may associate and offer themselves for the service, (not exceeding —— thousand men,) who shall be clothed and furnished with horses at their own expense, and armed, and otherwise equipped at the expense of the United States, except such of them as may choose to furnish their own arms, and whose commissioned officers shall be appointed by the respective State and Territorial authorities; who shall be liable to be called upon to do military duty at any time the President shall judge proper, within —— years after he shall accept the same; and when called into actual service, and whilst remaining in the same, shall be under the same rules and regulations, and be entitled to the same pay, rations, forage, and allowance for clothing, with the regular troops of the United States.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said this resolution had been introduced for the purpose of putting into the hands of the Executive a disposable force, which might be called out at a moment's notice, whenever the exigency of affairs might require it. By an act of the last session, the President had been authorized to call on the Executives of the several States for a detachment of the militia, and he was authorized to accept of volunteers as a part of the detachment. But that act did not authorize the President to accept the volunteers until such detachment should be called forth. This restriction had produced considerable inconvenience. It had left the Government without any organized force, until the detachment was called out. By the present resolution the President was authorized to receive the offers of the volunteer companies, that they might be organized, and be ready to enter into actual service at any moment. There was good reason to believe, that there was a number of citizens of the United States willing to offer their services, sufficient to prevent any attack on the frontier, or any other attempt that might be made to disturb the peace of the nation. Offers, to a considerable extent, had been already made. There could be no objection to vesting the President with authority to accept these offers, as it was not intended to incur any expense until the volunteers were called into actual service.

Mr. C. added that the services of these volunteers might be fully depended on, to defend the country, in case any hostile attempt should be made. Those who offered their services voluntarily, it would be admitted, were as worthy of reliance as men compelled to serve, or those who served entirely from pecuniary considerations. For these reasons he believed that no measures could be adopted, better calculated to repel invasion, or suppress any attempt that might be made against the peace of the nation.

Mr. DANA said, he observed that the chairman of the select committee had addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, requesting information with regard to the number of troops in the Army of the United States; to which an answer had been given by the Secretary, stating their amount, and the different stations at which they were posted.

Mr. D. said, he wished to know whether there was any necessity for any additional force, and to decide this point, he called for the reading of the law fixing the Military Establishment.

This law having been read, Mr. D. remarked, that the law was silent as to the amount of the Marine corps. He would wish some gentleman, acquainted with the subject, to give him this information.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said he would barely observe that the Message of the President, who must be considered as best acquainted with the situation of our troops, and such measures as are necessary to secure the frontiers, had stated the necessity of adopting measures to organize the militia that might be called out, or of obtaining volunteers. [Mr. C. here quoted from the President Message.] It would seem, upon this, that he meant to intimate the necessity of adopting such a measure, as was contemplated by the resolution. As to the information received from the Secretary of War, Mr. C. presumed every gentleman could estimate the number on the frontiers as well as the Secretary, as he advised us where the others were stationed, as well as that all the corps were nearly full.

Mr. DANA said he would freely acknowledge that one of the objects, which induced him to rise, was to obtain information as to the state of affairs, and the means we possessed of securing the country. He did suppose the House entitled to this information. He did suppose it proper for the Secretary of War to say what troops were in actual service. It required but superficial knowledge to know that the number of troops on paper were very different from the number of active troops. The last was what he wanted. Gentlemen had referred to the statement of the Secretary, and had said it supplied the means of making this estimate. But did they not know that the number which composed a company of artillery was not the same with that which composed a company of infantry? The Secretary did not in his letter discriminate between them. Mr. D. said he was willing to vote for whatever measures were necessary for the defence of the country; but he did believe that the representatives of the people, before they voted for such measures, had a right to more satisfactory information.

Mr. CHANDLER observed that he believed the Secretary of War had given information from which every member could adduce the information that the gentleman from Connecticut professed to desire. He tells us that the peace establishment is nearly complete; and as to the difference in the number of men that compose a company of infantry and artillery, it was too trifling to make any material difference in the estimate. The Secretary had not confined himself to stating the amount of our forces on paper; but had expressly declared that they are nearly complete. As to the Marine corps, Mr. C. said he did not know whether he was correct, but he had always considered it as more appurtenant to the naval than the military establishment; information relative to which could not therefore be expected from the Secretary of War.

Mr. DANA replied that all the information given by the Secretary was, that the companies were nearly complete. Who could say what was meant by nearly complete? It might mean that they were four-fifths full, as it was known that in common cases this was considered as tolerably full. Mr. D. said he wished for more precise information, and for one he entered his protest against so incomplete a statement. He did not think the representatives of the people should acquiesce in such a course. As to calling forth volunteers, he did not know that he had any objection to it; though perhaps a more efficient force might be proper.

Mr. BIDWELL said that the gentleman from Connecticut had not satisfied him that he was so ignorant as he professed to be. It appeared to him, on the contrary, that he had before him all the means of information that could be thought necessary. It was objected that the Secretary, instead of stating the exact return of each corps, had merely stated that they were nearly complete. It was true the Secretary had not stated the numbers in each company, whether there was two, or three, or half a dozen men wanting in each. This was not, perhaps, practicable; but the information, as their to present state, was given in terms sufficiently definite, when it was said they were nearly complete.

Another point of difficulty is, that the Secretary has not specified whether the eighteen companies posted at the different places named are artillery or infantry. It appears from his letters that eighteen companies are stationed at various places, and that the residue, to the number of twenty two, are with the Army under the command of the brigadier general. If any further information were required, he could not see the object.

Whether the present state of things was such as to authorize the President to accept of volunteers, every gentleman would judge for himself. It had rightly been observed, by a gentleman on the committee, that the volunteers would not be called out, though in a state of readiness, until there was actual occasion for them. An objection raised against a former establishment of this kind would not apply to this; for the officers were, under this resolution, to be appointed by the States, and not by the President of the United States. Mr. B. concluded, by saying, it appeared to him not only safe, but reasonable and necessary, to give the President this authority.

Mr. QUINCY said he would ask gentlemen what effect the resolution was likely to produce; whether there were any such associations of volunteers on the frontier as were contemplated in the resolution, and whether these associations were in such a situation as to enable them to render efficient services? He wished likewise to know the probable amount of those who were likely to offer their services to the President. An answer to these questions would enable him to decide whether this force, added to that of the regulars, would be competent to defend the country.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL replied that it would take a considerable time to answer definitely the questions of the gentleman from Massachusetts; but such data as the select committee possessed he would state. It was not contemplated to confine the offer of volunteers to the frontiers or the adjacent territories. On the contrary, it was proposed to authorize the President to accept the services of volunteers from any part of the Union. Nor was it necessary that those who offered their services should have associated as volunteers before this authority is given to the President. Mr. C. said he had understood that several corps of volunteers had already offered their services; that two or three regiments had offered in the Western country; that similar offers had been made in other States; and the papers would show that a like offer had been made in Philadelphia. This afforded sufficient ground for believing that a competent number of volunteers would offer for any exigency.

The question was then taken on the second resolution, which was agreed to without a division—when the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the resolution.

The House having agreed to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole,

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL moved to fill the blank in the first resolution with the word "thirty," which the House agreed to without a division.

Mr. C. then moved to fill the second blank with the word "two."

Mr. TALLMADGE suggested some difficulty which would probably arise from the ambiguous language of the resolution—to which Mr. C. replied that an attentive reading of the resolution was sufficient to remove it.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. VARNUM observed that the difficulty started by the gentleman from Connecticut was not ideal, and that although the volunteers might be accepted for two years, yet they might be scattered in a shorter time. This difficulty did not attend calling out a detachment of the militia, whose numbers would remain, for a long time, pretty nearly the same.

Mr. V. said, he wished to inquire what kind of troops these volunteers were to be denominated? Were they to be considered as belonging to the militia or the army? He knew of no other description of troops. The Constitution had authorized the General Government to provide for the defence of the country by raising armies, whose officers are to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by organizing and disciplining the militia, whose officers were appointed as directed by the State authorities. The contemplated body appeared to him to be of neither of these descriptions. It also appeared to him that a serious difficulty might occur in the appointment of their officers. It might be considered as doubtful whether the Executive department of the Government possessed the right of appointing the officers of any corps, except those in which authority was given by the Constitution, and these were the militia. Mr. V. said, he thought if the resolution directed that the volunteer corps should be commanded by officers of the militia, this difficulty would be removed.

Mr. V. added, that he did not see that the President would be certain of being able to command any particular number of these men, that might be wanted at any time. Suppose any of the State governments should neglect to appoint their officers, there were no means to compel the State authorities to make the appointment? Was it safe to rest the defence of the country on this ground?

Mr. FISK said, that the gentleman last up had two objections to the resolution; the first, that these corps would belong to no regular force; and the second, that there was no power vested in the Executive to commission the officers. The second objection was founded on the first, and, if the first fell to the ground, the last would fall to the ground with it. If it could be shown that these corps would be a part of the militia of the county, all difficulty would be removed. If they examined the Constitution, they would find that Congress had power to organize as well as arm the militia. The gentleman would not contend that Congress was obliged to organize the militia the same way in every State. The present corps were on the same ground with the common militia; they were only subject to be called on at any exigency—so was the existing militia. The advantage, however, of the former over the latter, was, that they would be equipped and prepared for service.

With regard to the difficulty, as to officers, it would occur in every case that had been mentioned. If there should be a detachment of the militia, the detachment would not consist of whole companies, but of parts of companies, who, when called into service, must have the officers attached to the entire companies, or new ones.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said, he apprehended that the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, had arisen, in a great degree, from not understanding the term State authorities, in the same way with the Committee. The first difficulty stated by the gentleman, of the possibility of the corps separating, appeared to him very extraordinary. The objection went too far to be a sound one. It went to show that, because they could not have a force which should be always equally strong, they ought, therefore, have none at all. But the gentleman might easily overcome this difficulty by augmenting the number of volunteers to forty thousand instead of thirty thousand.

Another objection offered, Mr. C. said, had been answered by the gentleman on his left, (Mr. FISK.) He would, therefore, only add, that he could not believe that the gentleman had seriously reflected on the subject, when he expressed a doubt whether this force would be of the militia or the regular army. It is expressly stated in the resolution that it shall be composed of such company or companies as may offer their services. Mr. C. said, he did not pretend to be much conversant in military language; but, according to his understanding of the term, a company implied a certain number of men, with officers appointed over them. The resolution went further, and made it necessary that the officers should be appointed by the State authorities—not meaning, as the gentleman seemed to infer, that they should be appointed by the Executive, but in the way prescribed by the respective State laws.

The gentleman had also inquired whether it will be safe to rest the defence of the country on these volunteers. We say that this will be providing a more efficient force than at present exists. As to any other more effective force, the propriety of that may be discussed hereafter. The acceptance of volunteers will not preclude the adoption of other measures, if they shall be deemed necessary.

Mr. C. said, he would have no objection to any amendment, predicated on the principle that the officers should be appointed according to the laws of the several States; but this he considered as matter of detail, which would be better settled when a bill was brought in.

Mr. C. said, it had been suggested by the gentleman that the President might appoint the officers; but, he differed widely from him on this head. He did not conceive they possessed the power to authorize the President to appoint them. There had been once a law to this effect; but it had been very generally reprobated by the republican party, who had considered it unconstitutional. Mr. C. said, in his opinion, it was directly in the teeth of the Constitution.

Mr. VARNUM said, he did not know but that the ideas of the gentleman were perfectly correct; but if so, none other than whole companies could be accepted. He, however, rather thought his ideas incorrect. The words of the resolution were: [Mr. V. here read the first resolution.] Now, a company, according to the meaning of the word, was a body of men composed of sixty-four privates, who, if they should associate together, although drawn from different companies, the President would have a right to accept; and, if so, the idea of companies who may offer, having officers, was incorrect.

Mr. V. said, he was perfectly willing to adopt measures for the protection of the country: and, if the militia were not properly organized, that they should be organized anew. If, however, they were so organized as to deserve to be trusted, it was improper to introduce a system which virtually declared them unworthy of confidence. The country was, at this time, in rather a peculiar situation. They had heard a great deal about conspiracies, and people were collecting together for certain purposes. He trusted there was no part of the people that would join in any dangerous attempts against the peace of the country; yet, on the principle of the resolution, such men might associate and choose their officers with the view of carrying on the plans they have in contemplation.

Mr. Bidwell observed, that the objects his colleague had in view would be attainable in the details of the bill, viz: that the officers should be taken from the existing militia officers of the State where there was no authority in the Executives to appoint them. This was, however, a matter of detail; but, to remove the difficulty of his colleague, he would offer an amendment to the resolution. Mr. B. then moved to strike out "whose commissioned officers shall be appointed by the respective State and Territorial authorities;" and insert "who shall be commanded by such officers of the militia of the States and Territories to which such companies shall respectively belong, as shall be designated by the Executive authority of each State or Territory."

The question was then taken on filling the blank with "two" years, and carried without a division.

Mr. G. W. Campbell said, he had before remarked, that this was a point that would be most properly settled in the details of the bill. But, he would observe, that it was not his object to give the appointment of the officers to the Executive, but that they should be appointed by the respective authorities provided in the several States.

Mr. Bidwell replied that the operation of the amendment would not be such as the gentleman from Tennessee combatted. It only went to give the Executives of the States a right to designate for the command such of the existing militia officers as they might think proper.

Mr. Smilie said, he was against the amendment. In the State he represented, the militia had a right to make choice of all their officers, from a Colonel downward; and he had no doubt of there being many men in the ranks who would make very good officers. As the amendment went to limit the range of choice, he was hostile to it. There were, likewise, other considerations that made him unfriendly to it. Was it not important, when men went out to sacrifice their lives in defence of their country, they should have the choice of their own officers? Would not this strengthen the attachment both of men and officers? Would not pride, too, have its influence on them? And would they not be more ready to support men of their own choice? Was it not to men being advanced, according to their merit, that the French army was indebted for its great ascendency?

Mr. Alston said, if they hesitated in the passage of any resolution on this subject, until every gentleman was satisfied as to the mode of officering the militia, there was no period which could be assigned to the protraction, as in every State a different mode prevailed. They could never be able to get along. Could not gentlemen agree to give up, in some degree, their own peculiar ideas, when an object of so much importance was to be effected? He did not care how the object was effected, provided it was constitutionally done.

Mr. Elmer said, the amendment went, as far as it had any operation at all, to do away the principle contained in the resolution, which was to authorize the calling out a body of volunteers. If the amendment prevailed, the men would be volunteers, but the officers be draughted. He could not see where the difficulty existed. The resolution authorized the President to call out any company or companies, which must consist of officers as well as privates; the same would be the case in the instance of a larger corps, such as a battalion or a regiment; and the only difficulty which could arise would be with respect to officers of a superior grade. Should there be a difficulty on this head, where one company was taken from one regiment, and one from another, it might be provided for in the details of a bill. For these reasons, he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. Dana called for a division of the question; when, on striking out the words moved by Mr. Bidwell, only ten members rose, and the motion to insert the other words, fell of course.

Mr. Masters thought affairs looked very serious, and he rose to inquire, whether these were all the measures contemplated to be taken? When the invasion of our territory was in question, he thought the most efficient measures ought to be adopted.

Mr. G. W. Campbell said he really did not suppose it was for the Committee to tell the House what they ought to do. They had made a report, in part, in which they recommended the adoption of such measures as they considered proper at this time. What might be proper to be done hereafter, he would not pretend to say; but he thought there might be a general concurrence in the measure now proposed, even by those who wished to aid it by stronger measures.

Mr. Kelly had no objection to authorizing the acceptance of a volunteer corps; his sole objection was as to the proposed mode. He believed such a measure necessary, but he could not give his consent to the terms of the resolution, or to the manner in which it was proposed to raise this force.

If he understood the report, it went to raise a force, which, according to the first resolution, was considered necessary for the defence of New Orleans. The second resolution provides for the acceptance of volunteers. This force was not subject, after being accepted, to the authority of the United States, till called into actual service. The resolution amounted to this: When the volunteer corps offered their services, in case they were not armed and equipped, they are to be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States, subject to the call of the President of the United States, within two years; but not subject to the rules for the government of the Army until called into actual service. When accepted, they become detached from the rules for the government of the militia of the respective States, without coming under the government of the rules of war, and thus appear to be under no government whatever. Suppose the President should accept of these volunteers immediately, they will not, notwithstanding, until called into actual service, be subject to his control, they will be only subject to such rules as they may choose to prescribe for themselves. Now it may happen that volunteer corps may offer at New Orleans, who, before the cession of that country, belonged to the King of Spain, and who, after they are armed by the United States, may change their sentiments, and choose to go under the Government of their old masters, or establish themselves in entirely detached corps. Under this view of the subject, Mr. K. said, he could not be in favor of the resolution. But if it could be so modelled as to authorize the President to accept volunteer corps which would pass immediately under the Government of the United States, he would agree to it.

Mr. Eppes said, he had hardly supposed there would have been any opposition to this resolution. When they considered the present situation of the United States, and when every man would admit that it was right to resort to preparatory measures of defence of some kind, he would ask gentlemen what course they would wish to pursue? Would they, in the existing posture of affairs, vote for raising an army, when they were not certain that there would be any occasion for it? If not, what expedient was left? Either to call out the militia, or to resort to a system of volunteers. The objection to calling out the militia had been already stated. Situated as they were, in some points not organized, and at a distance from the scene where they would be required to act, the public interest would materially suffer, if we trusted exclusively to them. On the other hand, if volunteers were received, if their patriotism was allowed to rally round the country, there was reason to believe that they would, in every respect, prove sufficient for its defence, without costing the public a dollar until called into actual service. Mr. E. said, he did not know that he should have said a word on this subject, but that the observations of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Kelly,) required some notice. We had recently acquired territory, and men who supported the character of Americans. He trusted they were disposed to treat and cherish them as such, and not to stamp them with the imputation of suspicion. When we have been officially notified, on a recent occasion, by the President of the United States, that they have acted with fidelity toward us, shall it be said that they may hereafter raise their arm in favor of their ancient masters? Mr. E. said, he begged leave to call the attention of the House to that part of the Message which related to this subject:

"I inform you, with great pleasure, of the promptitude with which the inhabitants of those Territories have tendered their services in defence of their country. It has done honor to themselves, entitled them to the confidence of their fellow-citizens in every part of the Union, and must strengthen the general determination to protect them efficaciously under all circumstances which may occur."

Shall men, thus recently presented to our notice, be now branded as traitors to their country?

Mr. Kelly said he had been certainly misunderstood. He did not mean to say any such thing as had been imputed to him. He had barely said that, if accepted and not called into actual service, some of them might hereafter possibly be disposed in favor of a change of masters. He did not mean to brand the people he had referred to, but merely to provide against what might be deemed a possible case.

Mr. G. W. Campbell said, he did not expect that this subject would have taken up more than a few minutes, and he should not have again troubled the Committee but for the insinuations thrown out by gentlemen.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had insinuated that some of the volunteer corps might prove unfaithful to the United States. Why such an idea had been thrown out, he could not comprehend, even if there was fear of such a result. Nothing was more likely to excite the feelings of persons so disposed, than to know that they were the objects of our suspicion. Are those men, whose services are wanted, to be told that they may turn their arms against their country? Is this the way to command their services or their confidence? Mr. C. regretted this insinuation more than anything he had heard thrown out in that body. Instead of this treatment, we ought to convince them that they possess our confidence, especially as every gentleman knew that the compensation offered would pay scarcely a fourth part of their expenses. There would, therefore, be little inducement for them to turn out, if they knew they would be the objects of suspicion.

As to the people on the frontiers, there was as little ground to suspect the purity of their conduct, as the conduct of persons in the heart of the Atlantic States. If there were conspirators against the peace of the country, you will find the body of them, said Mr. C., composed of men who have hitherto resided in the old parts of the Confederacy. You will find few or none of them on the frontiers; and, so far as I am acquainted with the people of this country, I believe there is no part of them more attached to the Government and the Union than the Americans on the frontier settlements, and I may extend the remark to a large portion of the foreigners.

Mr. Elmer believed that the sentiments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania were such as required notice in the details of the bill, in which it might be necessary to provide for the safe-keeping of the arms confided to the volunteers, as well as to determine by what rules they should be governed until they were actually called into service.

Mr. Dana said, if a bill were before the House, it might be proper to discuss all these details. This, however, was only a resolution fixing the principle. If a bill, it would be totally defective. It contained no provision as to the government of the body, or as to the staff or field officers; but these defects would, doubtless, be provided for in the bill. Since, however, he was up, he would say, he was far from considering the observations of his friend from Pennsylvania, as meriting the animadversions passed upon them. He had merely observed that, among thirty thousand men, there might be some who would be disaffected to the United States. He had fixed no particular imputation on any body of men. If he were wrong in this opinion, he was wrong in believing the President of the United States, who had announced the unpleasant fact, that enterprises had been formed against the possessions of a foreign Power. His friend from Pennsylvania had merely alluded to this idea, without specifying any particular point where such disaffection might arise.

Mr. Clark said it appeared to him that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not meant any particular allusion to the people of the Orleans Territory, who had been invariably attached to every nation under whose protection they had been placed. He was able to state, from circumstances within his immediate knowledge, that when the forces of the United States were not sufficient for the taking possession of the country, it was owing to the men under his command that the United States obtained peaceable possession. The people of the Territory had offered their services to the United States, and had been disregarded by the man put over them, and a preference given to another corps. The militia were in an unorganized state—there were, indeed, no militia in the Territory. But, he would venture to say that, whenever their services were required, they would come forward immediately, and would form a band for the defence of the country; and that if there should be a conspiracy against the United States, there would be no Louisianan concerned in it.

Mr. Epps rose merely to put the gentleman from Connecticut right. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had specially alluded to the militia of Orleans, and had spoken of their ancient masters.

The question was then put on the resolution, which was agreed to without a division; when the two resolutions were referred to a select committee, to bring in a bill.

And then the House adjourned until Friday.

Friday, December 26.

Another member, to wit: Matthew Clay, from Virginia, appeared, and took his seat in the House; and another new member, to wit: Dennis Smelt, from Georgia, returned to serve in this House, as a member for the said State, in the room of Joseph Bryan, who has resigned his seat, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. Elliot, one of the members from the State of Vermont, presented to the House certain proceedings, and a resolution of the Legislature of the said State, concurring with the resolutions of the State of Kentucky, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, "for confining the judiciary power of the Courts of the United States to cases in law and equity, arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority; cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers, and Consuls; cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; controversies to which the United States shall be a party; and to controversies between two or more States;" which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Marion presented to the House a petition of sundry merchants of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, which was received and read, praying relief for depredations committed on the ships and other vessels, with their cargoes, being the property of the petitioners, while in the pursuit of their lawful commerce, by the privateers and vessels of war of the French Republic.—Referred to Mr. Marion, Mr. Epps, Mr. Clinton, Mr. Tallmadge, Mr. Cotts, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Blount, Mr. Findley, and Mr. Tenney; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

On motion of Mr. Newton,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House the number and state of the frigates, and such other information, touching this subject, as may be in his possession.

Ordered, That Mr. Newton and Mr. Smilie be appointed a committee to present to the President of the United States the foregoing resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and seven. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. Findley presented to the House a petition of Montgomery Montour, a chief of the Delaware tribe of Indians, in behalf of himself and other chiefs of the said tribe, which was received and read, stating that at a treaty held by the Commissioners of the United States, and the Delawares, Pottawatimies, Miamies, &c.. and approved of by the President of the United States, on the twenty-fourth of April, one thousand eight hundred and six, an imposition was practised upon the said Commissioners in signing the names of the chiefs of his nation, who were not present at the said treaty, whereby the Delaware tribe have been unjustly deprived of their lands, and the improvements thereon; and praying that Congress will direct a survey of land to be made, including the lower town of the said tribe, on the Sandusky, with all their improvements, to be secured to the present inhabitants of their two towns, and their heirs, forever.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PUNISHMENT OF CERTAIN CRIMES.

On motion of Mr. Dawson, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, which was read by the Chairman, as follows:

A Bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if any person or persons shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin, or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise, with intent of taking possession of any fort, arsenal, magazine, dock, navy yard, or any public vessel of the United States, or of invading, or occupying with an armed force, any part of the United States, or the territories thereof, or with intent, in any other manner, of levying war against the United States, or of adhering to the enemies of the said States; or who, with intent, as aforesaid, shall combine or conspire together, or shall counsel, advise, or attempt to set on foot, provide, or prepare the means for any such military expedition or enterprise, or to procure any insurrection, unlawful assembly, or combination, for such purpose, although such expedition or enterprise shall not be carried into effect, and whether such conspiracy, counsel, advice, or attempt, shall have the proposed effect or not; every such person or persons so offending, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall suffer fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court in which the conviction shall be had, so as that such fine shall not exceed —— thousand dollars, or be less than —— dollars, nor the term of imprisonment be more than —— years, or less than —— years; and further, at the discretion of the court, be holden to find sureties for his, or their good behaviour, in such sum, and for such term, as the said court may direct: Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to prevent the trial and punishment of any person or persons guilty of treason, murder, or any other offence punishable by any law or laws of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the trial of the abovementioned offences may be had in any of the districts or territories where any of the acts constituting the offence shall have been committed, and all the acts constituting the offence may be brought in evidence on such trial, in whatever part of the United States, or the territories thereof, they may have been committed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of any judge or justice of the United States, or of any State or Territory possessing authority to bind to the peace and good behavior, that any person intends to commit any misdemeanor provided against by this act, it shall be lawful for such judge, or justice, to cause such person to be brought before him, and to require from such person good and sufficient sureties, in such sum as shall be deemed reasonable, that he shall not, by any act to be done within the United States, or the territories thereof, commit any offence against this act, within the term of one year, or such longer term as the case may reasonably require, and, in default thereof, may commit such person during such term.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in every case in which any military expedition or enterprise shall be begun or set on foot contrary to the prohibitions and provisions of this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such other officer as he shall have empowered for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval force of the United States, or of the militia therof, as shall be judged necessary for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of such expedition or enterprise.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States, or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval force of the United States, as shall be judged necessary, under the same restrictions and conditions as are by law provided and required on the employment of militia in the same case.

The first blank in the first section was filled with "ten;" the second with "five hundred;" the third with "ten;" and the fourth with "one."

The third section having been read,

Mr. J. Clay said, it appeared to him that this section gave most extraordinary powers to the justices of the peace. In the State which he represented, a justice of the peace was authorized to bind over an individual until a superior judge or court should have an opportunity of investigating the case. But, according to the provisions of this section, an ignorant justice of the peace might bind over an individual, or imprison him for a year, or longer, if he could not find sureties for his good behaviour. He would also inquire what evidence was required of the intention of the accused to commit the acts recited in the bill? The expression was, "whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction" of any judge or justice of the peace. No evidence was required of an overt act. It appeared to him that this provision was extremely dangerous. He, therefore, moved to strike out the section.

In reply, it was said by Messrs. R. Nelson and Dawson, that the object of this section was to give to justices of the peace, with regard to the acts against the peace of the United States made punishable by the bill, the same authority they possessed in the case of crimes committed against a foreign Power.

In the progress of the discussion, it was further remarked by Mr. J. Clay, that this section went to punish persons on mere suspicion. This appeared from comparing the provisions of the first section with those of this section. The former provided for the punishment of persons who should, within "the territory or jurisdiction of the United 'States, begin, or set on foot, or provide or prepare 'the means for any military expedition or enterprise, with intent of taking possession of any 'fort, arsenal, magazine, dock, navy yard, or any 'public vessel of the United States; or of invading or occupying, with an armed force, any part 'of the United States, or the territories thereof, 'or with intent, in any other manner, of levying 'war against the United States, or of adhering to 'the enemies of the said States; or who, with intent as aforesaid, shall combine or conspire together, or shall counsel, advise, or attempt to set 'on foot, provide or prepare the means for any 'such military expedition, or enterprise, or to procure any insurrection, unlawful assembly, or 'combination for such purpose, although such expedition or enterprise shall not be carried into 'effect, and whether such conspiracy, counsel, advice, or attempt, shall have the proposed effect 'or not." On examining the third section, it would be seen that this extraordinary power was given to any justice of the peace to whose satisfaction it shall appear that any person intends to commit any such misdemeanor. Mr. C. said he wished to know how it was to be ascertained when a person meant to intend to advise the setting on foot a military expedition, or what degree of criminalty would attach to a person intending to advise the making of such preparations. He trusted the section would be stricken out, and that the Committee would rise, in which case he would then move to recommit the bill.

Mr. R. NELSON acknowledged the section to be susceptible of the meaning given it by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which, however, he said had not been intended by the select committee who reported the bill. But he hoped that the section, instead of being stricken out, would be amended. It appeared to him that it might be so amended as to remove every objection that had been urged to it. By requiring evidence to be given on oath before the judge or justice, they were empowered either to recognise or commit the accused; and by limiting the recognisance or confinement until the next term of the court, and by striking out the words "intends to commit," he thought the section would be rendered unexceptionable. If the motion to strike out should be rejected, Mr. N. said he would offer an amendment to this effect, to strike out the exceptionable part of the section, and provide that any person who shall commit a misdemeanor against the act may be bound over by a justice or judge, to his good behaviour, to the next term, or be committed in case he fails to find sureties.

A debate of considerable length ensued on Mr. J. CLAY's motion to strike out the section, in which Messrs. J. CLAY, ELY, DANA, HOLLAND, FISK, QUINCY, KELLY, DWIGHT, and HASTINGS, supported, and Messrs. R. NELSON, SOUTHARD, SLOAN, COOK, and ALSTON, opposed it.

By the former gentlemen the principle embraced by the section was pronounced unconstitutional, unprecedented, and dangerously invasive of the most sacred rights of the citizen.

By the latter, the necessity of a modification conformable to that suggested by Mr. NELSON, was admitted.

As there was no substantial difference of opinion avowed, it is deemed altogether superfluous to enter into a wider detail of the arguments adduced.

The motion to strike out the section was carried by a large majority, eighty members rising in the affirmative.

The Committee then rose, and asked leave to sit again, which was refused by the House; when, on motion of Mr. J. CLAY, the bill was recommitted to Messrs. DAWSON, SMILIE, ELY, SLOAN, T. W. THOMPSON, NELSON, and DANA.

MONDAY, December 29.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, PHANUEL BISHOP; from New York, GURDON S. MUMFORD and NATHAN WILLIAMS; from New Jersey, WILLIAM HELMS; from Kentucky, JOHN FOWLER; and the Delegate from the Indiana Territory, BENJAMIN PARKE; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, during the year one thousand eight hundred and seven, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

On motion of Mr. EARLY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the prohibition of the slave trade.

The discussion of the amendment, which was offered on a former day by Mr. BIDWELL, to strike out of the third section so much as declares a forfeiture of the slaves, was resumed by the Committee.

Mr. FINDLEY was in favor of the amendment. He hoped that the slaves would not be forfeited, but bound out for a limited period as apprentices.

Mr. BIDWELL.—It appears to me that all the objections, which have been urged against the amendment under consideration, may be reduced to two. 1. That a forfeiture is necessary to deprive the importers of every motive to introduce any slaves into the country, and thus render the prohibition completely effectual. 2. That if the slaves are emancipated and turned loose in the Southern States, they will be a destructive nuisance to the people of those States. Neither of these objections is, in my apprehension, well founded. If the motion to strike out prevails, another amendment may be made, declaring that the importer has no right to the slaves, which he introduces. This will be a declaration conformable to the state of things, and in exact accordance with the laws of nature and of nations. It is not in order to offer an amendment now, but if the present motion prevails, I design to propose an amendment to this effect. This will answer the purpose completely, and remove from the importer every temptation to engage in this traffic. The idea of forfeiture proceeds wholly on a false principle. It implies that the importer has a right to the slaves. But an amendment like that which I have suggested will declare the fact as is it; it will be conformable to truth. But if the section passes as it now is, with the clause of forfeiture retained, we recognise in our statute book a false principle, which neither the Constitution, nor the laws of the United States, have ever authorized, to wit: that a property may be had in human beings. The Constitution and laws have always left the disposition of slaves to the States, and hitherto have never recognised the principle of slavery.

But if we do not forfeit the negroes, the question is asked again and again, with an air of triumph, what is to be done with them? For my part I had rather strike out the section, and do nothing at all than retain the forfeiture. If we do nothing we shall not increase the evil. They will then be left to the States to dispose of, according to the State laws. This will not increase the evil. I am, however, willing to agree to any practicable mode of disposing of them. But at any rate, I am for striking out the forfeiture, and opposed to disgracing our statute book with a recognition of the principle of slavery.

Mr. QUINCY.—Since there is so general an agreement as to the end, I wish it were possible we could unite more perfectly as to the means. Those in favor of forfeiture are anxious for nothing so much as to prohibit totally the importation of slaves. Indeed, it is for this very reason they are in favor of it, because they assert, and to my mind on unquestionable ground, that this is your only effectual means of prohibition. They are also anxious that if they are brought they should not be made slaves in their part of the country. As to their being made free in the Southern States, that is out of the question. The policy of those States, the first duty of self-preservation, forbid it. On the other hand, those against forfeiture not only wish to prohibit their importation, but, if imported, they declare they do not desire they should be made slaves, or even set free, within those States where this class of persons in such great numbers exist. Now is it not possible for us, who agree in so many particulars, to approach unanimity, at least on this point? This, it seems to me, would be effected, if the honorable mover, (Mr. BIDWELL,) and the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. FISK,) would descend from their high abstract ground to the level of things in their actual state—such as have, do, and will exist, after your laws, and in spite of them.

The argument of my colleague is, "forfeiture 'implies a right, vested in importers. Now it is 'disgraceful to the United States to admit such 'an implication. The importer has no right. He 'could acquire none. These persons are free by 'the law of nature—as free as any of us. The 'African Prince who sold them was a usurper. 'The purchasers in Africa were trespassers against 'the law of nature. They cannot acquire any 'right of property in these persons, and it is shameful for the United States, by forfeiture, to admit 'it." Sir, the conclusions of the gentleman are perfectly correct—his principles are solid. No man in this House denies either. Refer this question between the African Prince and his subjects, and between the African and his importer, to five hundred juries in New England, and five hundred times a verdict would coincide with the principles and reasonings of my colleague. But the misfortune is, that, notwithstanding all these true and unquestionable principles, the African Prince, at this day, does, and, after our law passes, will sell his subjects. To all practical purposes, a title is acquired in them, and they are passed, like other property, from one to another, in their native country. But this is not the worst. A title in this description of persons is not only allowed in Africa, but is, and must be, after your law passes, in a large section of your own country. The gentlemen from that part of the United States tell you that they cannot be allowed to be free among them. The first law, self-preservation, forbids it.

Now this is that real, practical state of things to which I invite gentlemen to look, and on which they ought to legislate.

I ask concerning it, how ought we to reason? What is our duty?

First. Do all you can to prohibit. Next, if you fail in this—if, in spite of your laws and their penalties, this description of persons be brought into the United States, then place yourselves in such a situation as may enable you best to meliorate the condition of this unhappy class of men, consistent with self-preservation, and with the deep stake which an important section of the country has in the policy which you adopt.

On both accounts forfeit. First, because it is the best means of prohibition. The gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. EARLY,) declares it is the only means by which you can do it effectually. The argument he used on this point, on a former day, is to my mind conclusive. From the situation of the Southern States, particularly Georgia, you can only prevent the traffic by taking away the inducement to purchase. And this can only be done by making the right of every purchaser be forfeited as a penalty. Next, if contrary to your laws they be imported, they are thrown on the humanity of the United States. They are brought here by our citizens, and it is the duty of the National Government to reserve the control of them, so as to be certain that the best is done for the amelioration of their condition that our own safety permits. On this account, forfeit. It is only as a commercial regulation that the National Government can get this control. If we do not take that title in these persons into the United States, which the laws of some States recognise, in those States they are slaves—they must be slaves. Those States can never permit them to be anything else. This can only be done by forfeiture. The character of your policy will depend upon what you do with them after the forfeiture. Gentlemen reason as if those persons were inevitably to be sold under the hammer. Certainly this is not the necessary consequence. Are they not after forfeiture at your control? May you not do with them what is best for human beings in that condition in which these miserable creatures are, when they first arrive in this country, naked, helpless, ignorant of our language, our climate, our laws, our character, and our manners? Are you afraid to trust the National Government, and yet, by refusing to forfeit, will you throw them under the control of the States, all of whom may, and some of them will, and must, make them slaves?

But the great objection to forfeiture is, "it admits a title." I answer, first, this does not necessarily follow. All the effect of forfeiture is, that whatever title can be acquired in the cargo shall be vested in the United States. If the argument of the gentleman be correct, and the species of cargo be such as that, from the nature of the thing, no title can be acquired in it, then nothing can vest in the United States; and the only operation of forfeiture is to divest the importer's color of title by the appropriate commercial term—perhaps the only term we can use effectual to this purpose, and which does not interfere with the rights of the States.

Grant that these persons have all the rights of man; will not these rights be as valid against the United States as against the importer; and by taking all color of title out of the importer, do we not place the United States in the best possible situation to give efficiency to the rights of man, in respect to the persons so imported? But, next, let us agree that forfeiture does admit a species of title, lost on one side and acquired on the other; such as we cannot prevent being recognised in those States where these importations will most frequently take place: I ask, which is best, and which most humane? Admit a title, gain it for the United States, and then make these miserable creatures free, under such circumstances, and in such time, as their condition into which they are forced permits, or deny the possibility of acquiring a title, and leave them to be slaves? But my colleague (Mr. Bidwell) has a sovereign specific for this. He says, "we do not make them slaves, we only leave them to the laws of the respective States." But I ask, if the laws of all the States may, and those of some of the States do, and necessarily will make them slaves, "by leaving them to the operation of the laws of these States" do we not as absolutely make them slaves as though we voted them to be such in this House? To my mind, when we have the power, if we fail to secure to ourselves the means of giving them their freedom, under proper modifications, we have an agency in making them slaves. To me it seems that the amendment proposed, striking out the forfeiture, will defeat the very end its advocates have in view. Really, sir, I fear it will happen to the honorable mover of the amendment (Mr. Bidwell) as it happened to another celebrated asserter of African rights—I mean the renowned Knight of La Mancha. We all recollect that while that worthy Knight was, with all the real honesty in the world, descanting on the moral fitness of things on the eternal, unalienable, imprescriptible rights of man!—that during all that time he was exercising himself and instructing others on these themes—the very persons he had undertaken to deliver—the great African Princess Micomicona, Queen of the great African Kingdom Micomicon, with her father, her mother, her brothers, her sisters, in short her whole family, were left in absolute and irretrievable slavery; their fetters not knocked off, nor their shackles lightened, nor one ray of light thrown in upon their prison. And yet the good Knight, with all possible self-complacency, astride of his theories, was couching his lance, scouring the plain, the mirror of philanthropic chivalry, the very cream of the milk of human kindness!

Now, I say, sir, a little more practicable good, and a little less theoretic impulse. Reason and legislate according to the actual state of this description of persons. Place yourselves so as to do the best possible for their good. They are thrown on your mercy. Do not trust to others. You can be most certain this power will not be abused in your own hands. Forfeit—because this is the technical word for getting the control of them, and the only certain way of making them secure of your humanity. But what shall be done with them? That is a subsequent consideration. It is enough for me to know that this House can never do anything with them which humanity and self-preservation do not dictate. Gentlemen will not pretend that these Africans have more rights by nature than our children. And yet, in every parish, poor children are bound out, without their consent, until they are of age, and of capacity to take care of themselves. These Africans are as helpless, ignorant, and incompetent as such children, and the wisdom of the National Legislature certainly can, and I have no doubt will, devise means to make them useful members of society, without any infringement of the rights of man.

Mr. Barker deemed the forfeiture necessary to render the prohibition effectual; otherwise the negroes would be landed on the shore, and, the vessels and captains who brought them escaping, they would be taken up and made slaves. Mr. B. was, however, unwilling to recognise the principle, that a right of property could be had in slaves. He wished that they might be taken care of by the Government, and comfortably provided for. He was against turning them loose on the people of the Southern States. Humanity, which should be extended to the whites as well as to the blacks, forbids it.

Mr. Fisk was for striking out. He thought the term forfeiture implied that the importer had a right till divested by statute. If the gentlemen against the amendment are sincere in their endeavors to prohibit the trade, they will vote for striking out the forfeiture. There is no need of such a provision. It was never thought that people or property shipwrecked belonged to the finder. Just so with slaves when brought here. They cannot be said in truth to belong to any one. It is our duty to take them and provide for them, if they need any assistance. Mr. F. declared his concurrence in the plan suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Findley,) to bind them out as apprentices.

Mr. Macon, (the Speaker.)—The gentleman from Vermont, who has just sat down, says, if we are sincere in our endeavors to prohibit the slave trade, we shall agree to the amendment. In answer to this, I shall only observe that our sincerity must be tested by our actions, not by our words.

I still consider this a commercial question. The laws of nations have nothing more to do with it than the laws of the Turks or the Hindoos. We derive our powers of legislation not from the laws of nations, but from the Constitution. If this is not a commercial question, I would thank the gentleman to show what part of the Constitution gives us any right to legislate on this subject. It is in vain to talk of turning these creatures loose to cut our throats.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Bidwell) says that no right to the slaves vests in the importer. If this is so, why in the name of God are you legislating on the subject? Why do you not leave them to themselves, like the Irish, Germans, and other Europeans, who flock to our shores? But if the importer has no right, whence do you obtain the right to bind them out as apprentices?

Suppose we leave them as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Bidwell) has suggested, what will become of them? They will be smuggled in and made slaves. All the arguments which I have yet heard have served to confirm the opinion that a forfeiture is the only effectual mode of prohibition; and though our sincerity has been doubted with an if, yet I believe every member in this House is solicitous to put a complete stop to this nefarious traffic.

Mr. Smilie.—I confess I still hold the same opinion on this subject as before. We cannot pass this bill, so long as this forfeiture is in it, and support a fair national character.

The honorable Speaker has stated one idea, and that boldly, too, which I confess is to my mind very novel—that we cannot take up this subject except on commercial principles. I shall make an observation or two, since we are challenged on the subject, to see if the doctrine is correct.

We cannot hinder this trade till 1808, but then our power will be unlimited. Suppose an American should go to Turkey, or any other part of Europe, and kidnap the unoffending inhabitants there, will the honorable Speaker say we cannot punish him except on commercial principles?

But this question is connected with principles of a higher order than those merely commercial. I beg leave on this occasion to refer to the principles of 1776, which have indeed been since laughed at, but which are now beginning, I hope, to be held in universal estimation. The Declaration of Independence contains this sentence: "We hold 'these principles to be self-evident, that all men 'are created equal; that they are endowed, by 'their Creator, with certain inalienable rights; 'that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit 'of happiness." Will the honorable Speaker tell us how these rights are connected with commercial principles?

The gentlemen from the South say, if we turn loose these Africans, they will be a terrible nuisance, and the whole inhabitants will be compelled, in self-defence, either to enslave or destroy them. I confess I cannot see the force of this argument. If this is a fair and honest account, every man in the Southern States will lend a hand to execute the law, and prevent the introduction of so dreadful a calamity. But if the forfeiture is retained, and the Southern people want slaves, the only difference under the law will be, that the United States will supply them by furnishing those forfeited negroes.

Mr. Sloan said he would not detain the Committee long. He had hastily drawn up an amendment, which he thought would meet the mind of every gentleman. He was sensible of its imperfection, and that it would want altering in the wording to make it correct. He would, however, beg leave to read it. The amendment was to the following effect:

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever any slaves shall be imported into this country after the 1st of January, 1808, if brought into a State whose laws do not permit slavery, they shall be free; if brought into a State whose laws do authorize slavery, such slaves shall be transported back to Africa, and if that is not practicable, they shall be bound out as apprentices.

Mr. Cook was in favor of the motion. Unless the slaves are forfeited, we can have no jurisdiction over them. It would be a new mode of legislation, and most singular law, to bind them out without their consent. Mr. C. could see no objection to the term forfeiture.

Mr. Findley, in answer to the Speaker, inquired if the rights appertaining to the United States, by the laws of nations, were not vested in Congress, who would exercise them? Clearly they were not vested in the State governments; of course they were vested in the National Legislature. Congress has manifestly a right by the laws of nations to expel aliens. The section in the Constitution which forbids us to prohibit the importation of slaves till 1808, clearly implies, that were it not for the restraining clause, we should now have the right of preventing any aliens coming to this country. Otherwise, why this restraint inserted in the Constitution?

It has been said that we cannot bind them out against their own consent. True, but if they are unwilling to be bound out for their own advantage, we shall be compelled to do it, or make slaves of them on principles of self-defence.

Mr. Southard observed, that the subject seemed really to be exhausted, but he would assign one reason for his vote. He was opposed to striking out the forfeiture, till he had seen some other plan devised. He had another objection to the amendment. It would leave the slaves in a worse condition than the forfeiture. Besides, Mr. S. thought the forfeiture the effectual way of stopping the trade.

Mr. J. Clay was against the amendment. He thought it must appear to every man of common sense, that the question could be considered in a commercial point of view only; why is the restraint in the Constitution coupled with the liberty of imposing a tax?

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Bidwell) has stated a great deal about the laws of nations, and my colleague (Mr. Smilie) has quoted the Declaration of Independence. But neither of them has anything to do with the question. The Declaration of Independence is to be taken with a great qualification. It declares those men have an inalienable right to life; yet we hang criminals—to liberty, yet we imprison—to the pursuit of happiness, yet he must not infringe on the rights of others. If the Declaration of Independence is taken in its fullest extent, it will warrant robbery and murder, for some may think even those crimes necessary to their happiness.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Bidwell) has virtually acknowledged that, by the laws of nations, we have no right to meddle with the negroes in opposition to the importers; else, why is the amendment which he has suggested necessary to make them free? On his principles they would be so without this declaration. Congress has no right to bind them out, or to say that a person who is by a State law a slave, shall be free.

Mr. Chandler thought the present amendment, coupled with the one which his colleague (Mr. Bidwell) designed to propose, if the present motion obtained, would prove as effectual as a forfeiture. Then the States may dispose of the negroes imported as they please. In Massachusetts they would probably be made free, and in the Southern States sold as slaves. Mr. C. was in favor of the motion.

Mr. Hastings.—In 1800 a law was passed to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country. This law declares that the vessel employed in such trade, together with her tackle, apparel, or guns, and the goods or effects, other than slaves, which shall be found on board, shall be forfeited. It also declares, that all persons interested in such vessel, shall be precluded from all right or claim to the slaves found on board such vessel, and from all damages or retribution on account thereof. This law has been in operation more than six years, and no evils have resulted from it. I cannot anticipate the evils which some gentlemen apprehend from striking out this clause in regard to forfeiture. Let the States take care to provide against any evils from this source. We shall do this at the Eastward. If the Southern people are alarmed at the apprehension of making these slaves free, let them prevent it by a municipal regulation. But I hope the General Government will never be disgraced by undertaking to sell human beings like goods, wares, or merchandise. I was in favor of the bill, as it was reported, with a clause punishing the importation of slaves with death. It is certainly a crime of the highest order. Piracy, forgery, and sinking vessels, with intent to defraud underwriters, are all punished with death. Yet these are crimes only against property; whereas the importation of slaves, a crime committed against the liberty of man, and inferior only to murder or treason, is accounted nothing but a misdemeanor.

The question being taken on the motion, to wit: to strike out of the third section so much as declared a forfeiture of the slaves, it was lost—yeas 36, nays 63.

Mr. Early observed that several additional amendments were necessary. By the third section, a ship once engaged in the slave trade is liable to be seized and forfeited at any future period. On motion of Mr. E. this clause was struck out—yeas 44, nays 35.

Mr. E. offered an amendment to prevent one judgment under this bill being a bar to another, on the ground that a friend might be employed to prosecute a collusive judgment obtained, and the statute thus evaded. This motion was supported by Mr. Early and Mr. Williams; and opposed by Messrs. Bidwell, Ely, and J. Randolph. On dividing the House, two members only rose in the affirmative.

Mr. M. Williams offered an amendment providing that foreigners who may violate the act should suffer the same penalties as our own citizens.

Mr. Early thought the gentleman could not have minutely considered the provisions of the bill, or he would have perceived that the motion was improper, as the case was sufficiently provided for.

Mr. M. Williams thought this and some other amendments necessary, but as the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Early) had been so long employed in manufacturing the bill, he would withdraw his motion.

On motion of Mr. Early, an additional clause was annexed to the first section, providing that the owners and masters of vessels employed in the slave trade should be imprisoned not exceeding ten years, nor less than five years.

Mr. Chandler moved that the blank should be filled with forty instead of ten—yeas 3.

Several other amendments affecting the details of the bill were, on motion of Mr. Early, adopted.

After two several times, on putting the question on the amendments, it appeared that there was not a quorum in the House.

The Committee rose and reported the amendments to the House.

Tuesday, December 30.

Mr. Bidwell, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the nineteenth instant, the bill to revive and make permanent "An act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses," and, in addition to the same, made a report thereon; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. Boyle, from the Committee on the Public Lands, who were directed by a resolution of the House, of the 18th instant, "to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act of Congress, of the 24th of March, 1804, as limits the time in which locations of Virginia military warrants shall be made," made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. Bassett,

Ordered, That the petition of Bushrod Washington and Lawrence Lewis, acting executors of General George Washington, presented to this House on the fourteenth of March last, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriation for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and seven. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto, which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the twenty-third instant, the report of a select committee on the petition of the inhabitants of the counties of Alexandria and Washington, be discharged from the farther consideration thereof.

The House proceeded to consider the said report: whereupon, the resolution therein contained being twice read, was agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the said memorial is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. Dawson, Mr. Magruder, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Verplanck, and Mr. Cutts, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. Early, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of Stephen Kingston; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. Dana said, that the House would recollect, that on a former occasion, it had been remarked by the honorable Speaker, that if the American merchants would agree to employ only seamen of our own country, a great controversy subsisting with Great Britain would be at an end. The resolution he held in his hand had for its object the holding out inducements to our merchants for employing American seamen. Various privileges were already granted by law to American merchants navigating American vessels, generally denominated discriminating duties, which extended to vessels built in the United States, and owned by citizens of the United States. If it should be also provided, that to entitle them to this discrimination, a certain proportion of the seamen navigating such vessels shall be citizens of the United States, it will become the interest of the merchant to employ American, in preference to foreign seamen. Of such a provision it would be a necessary appurtenance that the names of the seamen shall appear on the ship's papers, and thus there would be on board of each vessel a document, establishing the citizenship of the mariners, incapable of transfer. Mr. D. concluded with moving the following resolution:

Resolved, That, for the encouragement and security of the seamen of the United States, it is expedient to make provision that registered ships or vessels which may be employed in voyages to foreign ports after the —— day of ——, shall not continue to enjoy the provisions appertaining to ships or vessels of the United States, unless some proportion of the mariners on board the same shall be citizens of the United States.

Referred to the Committee of the Whole on Monday week.

GEORGE LITTLE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of George Little. The report is in favor of allowing the claim of the petitioner.

Messrs. Holmes, Dana, J. Clay, and Quincy, supported, and Messrs. Bidwell, D. R. Williams, Macon, and Varnum, opposed the report, which was agreed to—ayes 65, noes 45; in which report the House concurred—yeas 67, nays 46, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, December 31.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the present situation of the direct tax; from which it appears that $1,664,066 have been received, that near $176,000 are outstanding, and that the expenses of collection already ascertained amount to $120,000.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of George Little; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and seven, was read the third time and passed.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the twenty-ninth instant, to the bill to prohibit the importation or bringing of slaves into the United States, or the territories thereof, after the 31st of December, Whereupon, the first amendment being again read, in the words following:

"SEC. 1, line 7, Strike out, from the word 'slave' to the end of the section, the following words:

"And if any person or persons shall, after the said thirty-first day of December, transport or bring, or cause to be transported or brought into the United States, or the territories thereof, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, every person or persons, so offending, shall be guilty of felony; and being thereof convicted before any Court of the United States, having competent jurisdiction, shall suffer death;" and, in lieu thereof, insert:

"And if any person or persons shall, after the said thirty-first day of December, transport or bring, or cause to be transported or brought into the United States, or the territories thereof, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, every person or persons, so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and being convicted before any Court having competent jurisdiction shall suffer imprisonment not more than ten, nor less than five years:"

On the question of agreeing to this amendment a long debate arose.

Mr. SLOAN was decidedly opposed to the amendment. He was aware that some might charge him with departing from his well-known peaceable principles, in contending for so sanguinary a punishment as death. But many crimes inferior to this were punished with death, and he thought that there ought to be a proportion in these things. Mr. S. stated the hardships of the Africans, and the cruel circumstances attending their importation, and insisted on the magnitude of the crime at considerable length.

After some conversation between Mr. SMILIE and the SPEAKER, on a point of order, Mr. DANA called for a division of the question. The question was accordingly divided, the first being on striking out of the bill so much as inflicts the punishment of death.

Mr. ELY was against striking out. He deemed the crime in question as one of the most heinous kind, and one which ought to be punished capitally. But his principal reason for advocating so severe a punishment was, that he thought it the most effectual method of putting a stop to the trade. The other provisions of the bill were, in his opinion, not sufficient. If the punishment of death was inflicted, he presumed no persons would venture to engage in the trade, and run the risk of being punished, especially, as the traffic is one of the most uncertain and perilous kinds. It is said, if you punish with such severity, none will inform; but will any one venture to run the risk under this impression? Mr. E. thought not. Besides, this is the most humane punishment, because it will most effectually prevent the accumulation of miseries that result from the trade. It will, also, remove all the difficulties on the subject of forfeiture, by preventing the introduction of slaves.

Mr. TALLMADGE said, he considered the question before the House to be, whether we should strike out that part of the section which attaches the crime of felony to this nefarious traffic, and, of course, annexes to it the punishment of death. He trusted the House would not consent to strike out that clause of the bill, the retention of which should receive his hearty support.

Since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, I can scarcely recollect an instance in which the members seem so generally to agree in the principles of a bill, and yet differ so widely as to its details. There seems to be great unanimity respecting the atrocity of the crime, but a wide difference of opinion as to the measures necessary to prevent it. To me, it is matter of surprise as well as of regret, that gentlemen, who appear so ardently engaged to prevent the introduction of slaves into our country, should not be willing to unite with us in providing for it an adequate punishment. The evils which may be expected to result from this commerce, if persisted in, will fall on the Southern States; and the Eastern and Middle States are accused of carrying it on. If this be the fact, and gentlemen are sincere in their declarations, why will they not unite with us to mete out that punishment which, on their own statements, will fall exclusively on those who are concerned in this execrable traffic from the Northern States?

I will not take up the time of this House in repeating the remarks which have been so copiously, and, in my opinion, so justly, detailed as to the atrocity and enormity of the crime. My only wish is to affix to it so exemplary a punishment that we may, if possible, totally suppress it.

On a careful examination of the penal codes of the civilized world, it will be found that there exists a striking similarity between those laws which were early enacted, and that system which was given to govern the Jews. In the origin of that nation, their government was a pure theocracy. All their laws were enacted by infinite wisdom, and of course were well adapted to the ends for which they were made. Although some of them were local, and calculated for that nation alone, yet the great prohibitions and solemn injunctions contained in that code, are of eternal and universal obligation. In this system of laws, I find one perfectly in point for the present case. If it should be cited by statute and section, I presume it would be more familiar to, and better understood by this auditory. The act which I refer to is entitled "a law for man-servants," &c., and the prohibition is contained in the 2d book, 21st act, and 16th section (Exodus 21st chapter and 16th verse,) and is in the following words: "And he that 'stealeth a man and selleth him, or if he be found 'in his hand, he shall surely be put to death." If this was the punishment by Heaven decreed for man-stealers and man-sellers in the days of the Jews, has that crime become less heinous in our day, that the same penalty should not be inflicted now? If nothing short of death could atone for that crime then, shall fine and imprisonment be substituted in its place now?

On examining the penal statutes of the United States, as well as of individual States, we shall find that, to many crimes short of treason and murder, the law has awarded the punishment of death. Shall we place this most abominable traffic (which I fear ere long will call down the vengeance of Heaven on our heads) in the list of minor offences? If there is any conduct or crime which, from the motives that originate, the conduct which attends, and the consequences which may be expected to flow from it, merits a severe punishment, it appears to me that the commerce which this bill is calculated to interdict, pre-eminently demands it.

Mr. MOSELY.—The only objection which has been made against this section of the bill, as it was originally introduced, is, that the severity of the penalty as there prescribed, would probably prevent the law from being carried into execution.

I entirely agree in the justice of the general remark, that it is the certainty, more than the severity, of the punishment, which tends to prevent the commission of crimes; that when the penalty is excessive or disproportioned to the offence, it will naturally create a repugnance to the law, and render its execution odious.

But I would ask, in the first place, what punishment can be considered as too severe to be inflicted on this inhuman and murderous traffic? Viewed in all its consequences, there is hardly to be found, I apprehend, in the whole catalogue of crimes, one attended with more accumulated guilt. I have, indeed, sir, heard no gentleman suggest anything in palliation of this offence, or deny that it is justly deserving of death. Why, then, are we to presume that the law would not be enforced? The gentlemen from the South assure us that they, and the people whom they represent, are sincerely solicitous to prevent the further importation of slaves into this country, and they will cheerfully and cordially co-operate in the most effectual measures for that purpose. Will they, then, from motives of tenderness to the persons employed in importing them, be unwilling to subject those persons to the punishment they justly merit?

Sir, there is one circumstance worthy of attention, which I think must obviate every objection of this sort. Who are the people engaged in this business? We have been repeatedly told, and told with an air of some triumph, by gentlemen from the South, that it is not their citizens; that they have no concern in this nefarious traffic; that it is the people from the Northern States who import these negroes into the Southern States, and thereby seduce their citizens to become their purchasers. If this be the fact, are we to believe that they will entertain any particular feelings of partiality or passion towards this class of people, or that they will not feel a just degree of indignation towards them, and be disposed to subject them to the most exemplary punishment? And as it respects the great body of the people in the Northern States, at least, I will presume to say, of the State which I have the honor to represent, should any of their citizens be convicted upon this law, so far from charging their Southern brethren with cruelty or severity in hanging them, they would acknowledge the favor with gratitude. When we consider the character of the persons engaged in this traffic, that they are the most hardened and abandoned of the human species, and that it is extremely lucrative, can we suppose that any penalty short of death will deter them from it? I shall be very glad if even this will have the effect.

The great difficulty which appears in disposing of these people in a satisfactory manner, should they be brought into the country, furnishes a strong argument in favor of excluding them, if possible, in the first instance.

No difference of opinion appears to exist concerning the general principles of the bill. All agree that the importation of slaves ought to be prohibited as soon as it can be done consistently with the provisions of the Constitution. But in case of their introduction, it appears difficult to make such a disposition of them as will accord with the dictates of justice and humanity, and at the same time be consistent with the safety of our Southern brethren. And in legislating upon the subject, I would cautiously avoid doing anything that might hazard their safety or tranquillity. The gentlemen here who represent the Southern States, while they declare that they are heartily disposed to stop the further introduction of slaves into those States, and upon every principle of sound policy, to say no more, I conceive they ought to be, tell us that it is incompatible with their security; and that the people will never consent to have these negroes and people of color set at liberty among them. To have them forfeited and sold as slaves under the sanction of Government, appears to many altogether objectionable. To convey them back to their own country, and reinstate them in safety among their respective tribes, is considered as impracticable. For Government to undertake to bind them out for a term of years, as has been proposed, would no doubt be attended with many difficulties.

If, then, their importation in the first instance could be prevented, all these embarrassments and difficulties would be avoided. And, in a general view of the case, it appears to me highly important, at the present time, when our attention is particularly called to this subject by the Message of the President of the United States, that, in legislating upon this subject, the Government of the United States should manifest their abhorrence of this detestable traffic, and their decided determination, if possible, to put an end to it.

Believing that the penalty of death will have a more effectual tendency to do this than imprisonment, or any inferior punishment, I am against concurring in the amendment made to this section of the bill in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Elmer was in favor of the motion. If he believed that the Mosaic law was now binding, he should be of a different opinion. He believed the punishment of death immoral; because the crime did not imply murder, and had no analogy to it. Besides, he thought death would not be so effectual as imprisonment, nor so likely to be inflicted. The crime was committed merely out of a love of gain. Mr. E. concluded with declaring his abhorrence of slavery, and of the slave trade, and that he had never had any connexion with slaves.

Mr. Smilie.—I did hope that when the select committee reported the bill, with the clause punishing the importation of slaves with death, it would be adopted in that form. For myself, I confess I consider it as the very marrow of the bill. But, to my astonishment, the subject has been taken up on a new ground by the gentleman who spoke first, (Mr. Elmer.) That gentleman says it is immoral to inflict the punishment of death in this case. I confess that I did believe that the laws given by God himself were not immoral. The gentleman on my right (Mr. Tallmadge) did read such a law. I did believe that no immoral law could proceed from such a source. It is true that some of the laws of the Jews were applicable only to the peculiar circumstances of that people, and so not binding on other nations. But I consider it as not so with that law.

It is unnecessary for me to describe to this House the atrocity of this crime and the circumstances attending it. Gentlemen say, to excuse the business, that it is committed out of love of gain. So, when a man kills and robs me, you may say it is from the love of gain. But that is no excuse. It cannot be, sir. It is for the reputation of Government that there should be a uniformity in the criminal code. If you look into the laws of the United States, you will see that, in some cases, a man is put to death for stealing only fifty dollars. [Here Mr. S. read an extract from the laws of the United States, to show the correctness of his declaration.]

Suppose some philosophical historian, some ages hence, writing a history of this country, and looking into your criminal laws, (for it is the duty of a historian to understand laws,) should find that you punish him who steals only fifty dollars with death, and punish the man-stealer with imprisonment only, what would such a historian say? Would not the paragraph in his history be an everlasting disgrace to our memory?

All of us seem to agree in the horrid nature of the crime, and the only objection to capital punishment is, that it cannot be carried into execution, because the people do not consider the crime worthy of death. Sir, I have a better opinion of the people of the United States. I have no doubt but that the law can and will be executed. Criminals can be removed from one State to another for trial, if necessary, but I presume it will not be. Gentlemen say that the people of the Southern States have great cause to be alarmed at the idea of continuing this traffic; far more cause than the people of the Eastern and Middle States. If this is true, and it certainly is, they will be more solicitous to punish this crime. If the law can then be executed in the Eastern and Middle States, it can be in the Southern States.

I do hope for the honor of this country; for the honor of our Government; for the honor of our nature, that this bill will pass without this alteration. It will transmit to the world our opinion of this crime. And I do trust that, when it is known how infamous we consider it, that the traders will be induced not to engage in this business, and that we shall be no more troubled on this subject.

Mr. Lloyd.—Though this traffic is sanctioned by the Constitution and laws of the United States, I regard it with hatred and abhorrence, and conceive it to be of the highest importance that we take means to put a complete stop to its further continuance. But, in my opinion, the punishment of death is not best calculated to accomplish this object. Besides, it is not proportional to the crime. This subject has not, I conceive, been fairly argued. Very few of the negroes brought into this country are kidnapped and stolen away. Look at the condition of the people of Africa. Three-fourths of those brought into this country are slaves originally, either by descent or conquest. It is a fact that slavery prevails extensively in Africa. Those taken in conquest are disposed of and sent abroad on account of the vindictive spirit of those people. Such is their thirst for revenge, that this is absolutely necessary for the safety of the conqueror. Of course, all the arguments urged on the ground of the slaves being kidnapped and carried away from a state of freedom, are fallacious.

Gentlemen have referred us to the Mosaic law on this subject as an authority. But, suppose you should adopt all the principles of that law, what would the people of the United States say to it?

Would they acquiesce? Though these laws were proper for the Jews, they are not so, of course, for us. They contemplated no other than temporal rewards. If I recollect right, there is no part of the Jewish dispensation which holds out the idea of a future state.

Another argument is urged. It is said that if a severe punishment is inflicted, the other provisions of the bill will be rendered unnecessary. In answer to this argument, I would refer gentlemen to the very example of the Jews. Though their criminal laws were numerous and excessively severe, yet we find that they were the most debased creatures on earth. Look to the countries of Europe, and especially to Great Britain, for the effect of severe criminal laws. It is found that severity of punishment multiplies rather than diminishes the number of crimes. Look into ancient history and read the sanguinary laws of Draco. Why did they exist no longer? Because they were so severe that they could not be endured. I am of the opinion, that in this case, imprisonment will be a more effectual punishment than death, and am therefore in favor of striking out.

Mr. Olin.—I would ask gentlemen if they would not as soon be willing to be brought to the halter as to be made slaves for life? If they would, and I trust they would, man-stealing is a crime as bad as murder, and ought to be punished as heavy. I was at first against the punishment of death; but I own that gentlemen have convinced me by their arguments, and I am now the other way. I am persuaded that gentlemen will think there is nothing dishonorable in this changing one's mind.

Mr. Early.—I formerly thought that the decision on this question was not a matter of any great importance; but as it seems now to be considered as a prelude to an attack on subsequent parts of the bill, it appears to me now important that the subject be well understood and rightly decided.

What are you told? You are now told that a forfeiture is unnecessary, and that to inflict the punishment of death is the only way to stop this trade. I consider this as an old attack revived in a new form. I hope the House will pardon me for undertaking to assign reasons for the bill as reported.

We are told by one gentleman (Mr. Ely) that in this case there is ample time during the voyage for the trader to reflect on the enormity of his crime and the severity of the punishment, and that, in consequence of such reflections, he will be persuaded to abandon his enterprise. We are told that those who violate this law, will not do it from a sudden gust of passion, or momentary desire of gain, as is commonly the fact in case of murder, robbery, and theft; that it must be done deliberately, and after ample reflection on the guilt of the transaction. The gentlemen's premises are not universally correct. I doubt if even they are generally true. They are true only in those cases where a man's innate sense of right and wrong tells him that he is violating a moral law. This is not the fact with regard to the importer.

But admit the gentleman's premises to be correct, and his reasoning sound, his ideas have no practical application to this subject. Let me ask how they apply to the indirect trade, the trade from the Spanish territories? Here is the danger. It is from this quarter that you are to apprehend the introduction of slaves. Here the importer is beyond your jurisdiction; he is even beyond your reach. You cannot touch him. I should like to know how the fear of punishment will operate on him. I should like to know how the fear of death will operate on a man who is bound with his slaves to a country where he knows the punishment will not be enforced. He will be bound to a country where the people see slaves every hour of their lives; where there is no such abhorrence of the crime of importing them, and where no man dare inform. My word for it; I pledge it to-day, and I wish it may be recollected; no man in the Southern section of the Union will dare inform. It would cost him more than his life is worth. No man would risk it when it led to the punishment of death, when it was not for an offence which nature revolts at. They do not consider it as a crime.

We have been asked what punishment can be considered too severe for so atrocious a crime. Without answering the question in the abstract, it will be sufficient to answer it by a practical view of the subject. How do people consider the transaction? That is the question. Do they consider it such an outrageous crime? They do not. Gentlemen may legislate to suit their feelings, and not to suit the habits of the people for whom they legislate. Their reason must tell them that this is the fact.

Suppose a law had been made to punish with death all those concerned in the insurrection of 1793, could the law have been executed? Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania answer on this subject? It could not have been executed because so many people were concerned. So in this case. All the people in the Southern States are concerned in slavery. It is not then considered as criminal.

The gentleman (Mr. Smilie) has said that, in the Southern States, slavery is felt and acknowledged to be a great evil, and that therefore we will execute a severe law to prevent an increase of this evil. Permit me to tell the gentleman of a small distinction in this case. A large majority of the people in the Southern States do not consider slavery as a crime. They do not believe it immoral to hold human flesh in bondage. Many deprecate slavery as an evil; as a political evil; but not as a crime. Reflecting men apprehend, at some future day, evils, incalculable evils, from it; but it is a fact that few, very few, consider it as a crime.

It is best to be candid on this subject. If they considered the holding of men in slavery as a crime, they would necessarily accuse themselves, a thing which human nature revolts at. I will tell the truth. A large majority of people in the Southern States do not consider slavery as even an evil. Let the gentleman go and travel in the quarter of the Union; let him go from neighborhood to neighborhood, and he will find that this is the fact.

Some gentlemen appear disposed to legislate for the sake of appearances. One in particular (Mr. Smilie) is disposed to legislate for the honor and glory of the statute book. I should like to know what honor you will derive from a law that will be broken every day of your lives. Will this honor afford you any satisfaction for the evasion of the law? I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. Ely thought, in opposition to the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Early,) that the punishment of death would operate to prevent the indirect trade. As to the question whether it is criminal in the Southern people to continue to hold their slaves, he believed it was not generally thought a crime; but whether it was a crime or not, made no difference as to the question before the House. The object is now to prevent the trade.

Georgia, by her constitution, recently adopted by the people of that State, or at least by a law, has prohibited the slave trade. Now, then, is it conceivable that they are disposed to continue the trade? There is no connexion between continuing the trade and continuing to hold their present slaves. All the Southern States, one only excepted, have expressed their abhorrence of this trade, and passed laws against it. On the gentleman's (Mr. Early's) reasoning, you cannot prevent the trade by any punishment whatever. If the people consider it proper, they will, on his reason, never inform. I trust, however, that if we make the punishment death, few will venture to run the risk of an examination and trial.

Mr. Holland.—In the Southern States slavery is generally considered as a political evil, and in that point of view nearly all are disposed to stop the trade for the future. But have capital punishments been usually inflicted on offences merely political? I believe not. Fine and imprisonment are the common punishments in such cases. The people of the South do not generally consider slavery as a moral offence. The importer might say to the informer that he had done no worse, nor even so bad as he. It is true that I have these slaves from Africa; but I have transported them from one master to another. I am not guilty of holding human beings in bondage. But you are. You have hundreds on your plantations in this miserable condition. By your purchases you tempt traders to increase the evil. You and your ancestors have introduced this calamity into the country, and you are continuing, you are augmenting it. The importer might hold the same language to the jury and the judge who try him. He might tell them that they were even more guilty than he. Under such circumstances the law inflicting death would not be executed. But if you punish by fine and imprisonment only, you will find the people of the South willing and ready to execute the law.

Gentlemen always appear on this subject to blend the question of immorality with that of political expediency. But it is a fact well known that the negroes imported are brought from a state of slavery. There is only a transfer from one master to another; and it is admitted that the condition of the slaves in the Southern States is much superior to that of those in Africa. Who, then, will say that the trade is immoral?

The laws of Moses have on this occasion been cited. But if you look further, you will find them almost as bloody as those of Draco. Besides, if that good old book is brought in, many things will be found on the other side. Slavery appears to be tolerated there.

Mr. Stanton.—In 1784, Rhode Island passed a law declaring that all blacks, from thereafter, should be as free as the whites. But, since, some people of that State have been tempted by the high price offered for negroes by the Southern people to enter into this abominable traffic. I wish the law made strong so as to prevent this trade in future; but I cannot believe that a man ought to be hung for only stealing a negro. Those who buy, are as bad as those who import them, and deserve hanging quite as much.

Mr. Dwight.—We are all happily agreed in the great object of the bill—the prevention of the importation of slaves into the United States. Unfortunately, we are not so well agreed in the means to effect this object. It is not, however, at all strange that men should differ about the best mode to accomplish so important a purpose; and especially men in the circumstances in which we are placed. Those of us who come from the Northern and Eastern States, where slavery exists not at all, or but in a slight degree, would naturally view this subject in a very different light from gentlemen who represent the Southern States, where slavery always has existed, and that to a great extent. As great a degree of unanimity as is possible is of much importance, both for the purpose of effectually preventing this inhuman traffic, and for the honor and reputation of our country.

The point now to be settled is, shall we declare the being concerned in the importation of slaves a capital offence, or shall we leave it subject only to fine and imprisonment? Those gentlemen who are in favor of the latter punishments, object to the former as being disproportioned to the offence. The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Lloyd,) in attempting to lower the nature of the crime, has urged an argument in extenuation of the slave trade entirely new. He says, the negroes are of such a turbulent and vindictive character at home, that the chiefs of their nations are obliged to transport them for their own safety. [Here Mr. Lloyd interrupted Mr. D., and said, that the gentleman certainly misunderstood him; that he had not intended to justify the slave trade at all; on the contrary, he condemned it entirely. He had only mentioned the facts, that the Africans were slaves at home, and that they were of such a vindictive character that it was not safe to have them in the country.]

Mr. Dwight.—I understood the gentleman before precisely as I do now. I did not understand him to approve of the slave trade. My argument was, that in order to lessen the nature of the crime, he had stated that such was the character of the Africans, that it was not compatible with the public safety that they should remain in their own country. If the fact be so, sir, that they are such troublesome, and even dangerous subjects, even in that case I should be extremely sorry to hear that the people of this country should take upon themselves the disgraceful task of executing the laws of the black chiefs of Africa.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Early) has informed us repeatedly that a law making this a capital offence cannot be executed in the Southern States; that the importation of slaves has so long been familiar to them, that a great majority of the people consider it not as an aggravated crime, and a large portion of them as no crime at all; that if we make such an offence capital; if we make the consequence of importing a cargo of slaves to be the loss of life, no man will ever be prosecuted for it, because no man will dare inform. All the gentlemen, sir, from the Southern States, who have spoken on this subject, have told us that they earnestly wish effectually to prevent the slave trade in future. I am disposed to credit them fully. Indeed, I cannot conceive that they should not sincerely and fervently wish to prevent a traffic, which, if persisted in, must in all human probability, first or last, bring upon them and their families the most tremendous calamities. If, then, they view the subject in this light, if they are sincere in making these declarations, there is not only no danger that the law will not be executed, but they will unite to a man to execute the law; the whole community will inform; a regard to their own lives, and the lives of their posterity, will drive them to it. And if, sir, in the rigid execution of this statute, its penalties fall upon men from the Eastern States, who are profligate enough to engage in this inhuman trade, I most heartily concur with my colleague in saying, let the law have its full force, let it fall with all its force upon the offender; let him die.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Holland) has told us, that morality has nothing to do with this traffic: that it is not a question of morals, but of politics. Sir, the President of the United States, in his Message at the opening of the present session of Congress, has given us a very different opinion. His language is: "I congratulate you on the approach of the period at 'which you may interpose your authority, constitutionally, to withdraw the citizens of the United 'States from all further participation in those violations of human rights, which have been so 'long continued on the unoffending inhabitants of 'Africa, and which the morality, the reputation, 'and the best interests of our country, have long 'been eager to proscribe." Here we are informed, sir, that the slave trade is a violation of human rights; and that not only the best interests and the reputation of our country, but that morality itself is deeply concerned in it, and has long been eager to proscribe it. But, need we inquire whether it is immoral to inflict evils upon unoffending Africans? The gentleman says, that we do them no injury; that they are slaves at home, and and we only transfer them from a state of slavery there to one attended with fewer calamities here. Sir, by what authority do we interfere in their concerns? Who empowered us to judge for them as to which is the worse and which the better state? Have these miserable beings ever been consulted on the question of their removal? Who can say that the state in which they were born, and to which they are habituated, is not more agreeable to them than one altogether untried, of which they have no knowledge, and about which they cannot even make any calculations? Let the gentleman lay his hand on his heart; let him ask his own conscience, if it is not a violation of human rights, if it is not immoral, thus forcibly to carry these wretches from their home, and from their country; and if that does not answer in the affirmative, I will never request him to apply to any other monitor.

In discussing this question gentlemen have appealed to the laws of Moses. In my opinion, sir, we had better confine ourselves to the business of legislation than to undertake the task of expounding Scripture. From the opinions that have been given, I think we shall appear to more advantage in the former than we do in the latter. We should probably find it necessary to furnish ourselves with a new set of authors, and to pursue a different course of studies, to qualify us for expositors, from that which we have pursued to prepare for our present employment.

Mr. J. Clay rose to make only one observation. It must occur to every Pennsylvanian in the House, that it had been the policy of that State to abolish the punishment of death in all cases except murder in the first degree. And even in those cases, all indicted in Philadelphia had been, Mr. C. believed, either acquitted or pardoned. Mr. C. did not believe that the law, if it inflicted the punishment of death, could be executed. A jury would not convict.

Mr. Smilie rose in answer to his colleague (Mr. J. Clay.) I have asserted, and that boldly too, and I will assert it again, that this law can be executed in Pennsylvania. I have never known an instance there of murder in the first degree that was not punished with death. And if the law can be executed against murder, it can in this case; for here is a crime above murder. It is man-stealing added to murder.

Mr. Sloan.—The observations of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Lloyd) and from North Carolina, (Mr. Holland,) bring to my mind a dispute which once took place between two of my neighbors, a long while ago, about a passage in the bible, which was settled by an appeal to a Roman Catholic. Mr. S. related the circumstances of the story at some length.

I could detain the House a long time in telling them what I have read in authors on African slavery, in authors which are entitled to as much credit, and which I believe as fully as those the gentlemen (Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Holland) have ead. I could detain the House a long time in elling them how they used to be landed in Jersey, near where I live, when I was a boy growing up, because in Pennsylvania there was a duty of $10 a head. I could detain the House in relating the pitiful stories I have often myself heard from those poor slaves who were about my own age, as we used to be together, how they were kidnapped and stolen away, in the most piteous manner, and what a paradise their home in Africa was to their situation here.

The question was loudly called for, and was about to be put, when Mr. ELMER rose. He hoped the House would not be led away by the declamation of the gentleman. Mr. E. spoke further at some length.

Mr. BARKER agreed with gentlemen as to the heinousness of the crime, but differed with many from the same quarter of the Union (Eastern States) as to the punishment. He thought the punishment of death both unjust and inexpedient; unjust, because not necessary for the safety of society; and inexpedient, because not the most effectual punishment. He thought it would be better to enslave the importer. Let him be put to labor, and know a little by experience what the evils of slavery are.

Mr. VARNUM thought the Southern States were in imminent danger from slavery. He recollected that he had heard a Southern gentleman, formerly a member of that House, compare that part of the Union to a bundle of combustibles, which only wanted a little fire to kindle a blaze that would consume them.

If the Southern people would not inform, in case the punishment is death, they will not in case of imprisonment for ten years. If they consider the importation no crime, as has been stated, they will not execute any part of the law, and no punishment can be inflicted. But I have a better opinion of the Southern people. I have so often heard gentlemen from the South express their dread of the final ruin of that country from slavery, that I do believe this law can and will be executed.

Mr. FINDLEY gave his opinion that the law could be executed as well in Pennsylvania as in any quarter of the Union. The United States laws, in some cases, inflict the punishment of death, when it is not done by the Pennsylvania laws, and yet there is no difficulty in executing those penal laws of the United States. Mr. F. was against striking out.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, on striking out so much of the first section as inflicts the punishment of death on owners and masters of vessels employed in the slave trade, it was carried—yeas 63, nays 53, as follows:

The question on inserting, in lieu of what was stricken out, a clause prescribing imprisonment for not more than ten, nor less than five years, was carried without a division.

The amendments to the second and third sections were read and agreed to, when after several unsuccessful attempts to adjourn, the further consideration of the subject was postponed till Friday—ayes 71—to which day the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 2, 1807.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing the transcript of decisions, and report on rejected claims, made by the commissioners appointed to examine the claims to land in the district of Detroit, in conformity with the several acts making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Territories of Indiana and Michigan; which were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. CLOPTON, the petition of sundry British merchants and others, subjects of His Britannic Majesty, presented to this House on the 21st of December, 1804, was referred to Mr. CLOPTON, Mr. NATHAN WILLIAMS, Mr. HELMS, Mr. BISHOP, and Mr. FOWLER; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. MUMFORD presented to the House a petition of David Gelston, Collector of the Customs of the district of New York, which was received and read, praying to be reimbursed in the amount of damages and costs sustained by him in attempting to detect, by judicial prosecutions, frauds committed in obtaining from his office, contrary to the laws of the United States, registers for vessels owned wholly, or in part, by the subjects of His Britannic Majesty.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented to the House a petition of sundry inhabitants of the city of Washington, in the Territory of Columbia, whose names are thereunto subscribed, which was received and read, praying that a law may be passed, authorizing the cultivation of the public ground in the said city, by the inhabitants thereof, upon such terms, and under such regulations, as Congress may deem just and proper.—Referred to Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. GRAY, and Mr. COVINGTON; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. TENNEY, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine the Journal of the last session, and report therefrom such matters of business as were then depending and undetermined, made report, in part; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, from the committee appointed on the eleventh ultimo, presented a bill for the encouragement of learning, and for the promotion of the useful arts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, further provision ought to be made, by law, prescribing the manner in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of one State shall be proved and given in evidence in another State, and the effect thereof; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. BIDWELL, Mr. FISK, Mr. ELMER, Mr. EPPES, Mr. THOMAS W. THOMPSON, and Mr. SANDFORD.

On motion of Mr. ROGER NELSON,

Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States, of the fifteenth ultimo, communicating a report of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, at the City of Washington, on the subject of the said buildings, be referred to Mr. ROGER NELSON, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. FINDLEY.

Mr. J. CLAY from the Committee appointed on the petition of sundry patentees and Oliver Evans, presented a bill for the encouragement of learning, and the promotion of the useful arts, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAWSON observed that in the year 1803, a resolution had been passed by the House, which was the basis of a law for the extension of the external commerce of the United States for which purpose a small appropriation had been made. The law had been discussed with closed doors; after the passage of which the injunction of secrecy had been removed. Soon afterwards, an expedition had been undertaken by Capt. Lewis, Capt. Clarke and others, which, they had been advised, had been attended with all the success expected. These gentlemen have traced the Missouri to its source; and have passed along the Columbia to the Pacific Ocean, exploring the course of various streams, and making themselves acquainted with the adjacent country and its inhabitants. In doing this, they have traversed an immense country, and have encountered and overcome great difficulties and perils. Mr. D. said they had fortunately returned, and, in his opinion, deserved not only the thanks of their country, but likewise the gratitude of posterity. Mr. D. said he had been induced from these considerations to invite the attention of the House to the subject, in the propriety of which he was confirmed by the original communication of the President, which held out the idea, that in the estimate submitted to the House, the sum then appropriated was but a part of what might eventually be necessary.

Mr. DAWSON concluded by offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That a Committee be appointed to inquire what compensation ought to be made to Messrs. Lewis, and Clarke, and their brave companions, for their late services in exploring the western waters, to report by bill or otherwise.

This resolution was immediately agreed to without a division, and Messrs. ALSTON, BARKER, BLAKE, J. WHITEHILL, and MORROW, of Virginia, named the committee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the petition of Anthony Benezet and others, which report was favorable to the prayer of the petitioners. A debate of considerable length arose, in which Messrs. J. CLAY, FINDLEY, J. RANDOLPH, R. NELSON, SLOAN, SOUTHARD, and ALEXANDER, advocated—and Messrs. HOLLAND, BIDWELL, MACON, JACKSON, and ALSTON, opposed the report; when the question was taken and the report agreed to.

The Committee rose, and the House immediately considered their report, and agreed to it—ayes 51, noes 46; when the Committee of Ways and Means was instructed to bring in a bill.

JUDICIAL COURTS.

Mr. ELLIOT moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire what amendments and alterations are necessary in the several laws relative to the organization, powers, and duties, of the judicial courts of the United States; and that the said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. E. said that he had the honor, some days since, to present to the House certain resolutions of the General Assembly of Vermont, concurring in an amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States, by the State of Kentucky, contemplating a material limitation of the present Constitutional powers of the Federal Judiciary. This amendment has been adopted by several States, but has also been rejected by such a number, as completely to ascertain the fact, that it cannot at present become a part of the Constitution of the United States. Great evils certainly exist in consequence of the exercise of the powers now legally vested in the federal courts; and it becomes important to inquire whether those evils cannot be removed by the ordinary means of legislation, exercised within the sphere of the Constitutional powers of Congress. From the attention which he had been able to pay to the subject, Mr. E. said that he was convinced that most of the grievances complained of might in this way be redressed; and it was to bring this important subject before the House that he was induced to make the present motion, and to hope for its adoption.

The resolution was adopted without a division, and referred to Messrs. ELLIOT, G. W. CAMPBELL, MUMFORD, SMELT, BOYLE, DWIGHT, M. CLAY, BROOME, and LLOYD.

PUNISHMENT OF CERTAIN CRIMES.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, reported the bill with an amendment, striking out the third section, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on Monday.

Mr. DANA observed that prosecutions, he understood, were depending in the courts of the United States, not arising under any existing statute or treaty of the United States, but prosecutions sustained at common law. In four cases warrants had been issued at the order of the court, the parties arrested and held to trial. Two of these prosecutions were against printers, for publications, which had appeared in their papers; two against clerical gentlemen, for words uttered by them. The charges extended to various questions respecting political conduct, morality, and religion. It was a subject of vast importance, whether this extensive range would be allowed to a public accuser, holding his place at the will of the Executive of the United States.

At common law, a libeller may be subjected to fine and imprisonment, according to the discretion of the court, to which might be added the mutilation of the ears, according to the doctrine of Coke, in the Star Chamber. Security may also be required for good behaviour for his whole life. To the amount of fine there was no limitation.

There was also involved in these prosecutions an interesting question as to evidence. Shall the truth of the charges, once established, be considered as conclusive evidence, however pure the intentions of the accused may be proved to have been? With this question was connected the provisions of a celebrated declaratory statute carried through the British Parliament by a distinguished man, as implicating the point how far this statute affected the common law in the United States. There was likewise another question, viz: whether the person charged with having uttered slanderous words shall have liberty to prove the truth of what he uttered. This liberty was denied by the courts of Star Chamber in England. Such had been the fact in the case of Zenga in America, and in a case which had recently occurred in one of these States, in the second circuit of the United States, on the trial of Croswell. Mr. D. concluded by observing that he had suggested these ideas as an apology for asking that the subject might be examined; and then he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether prosecutions at common law should be sustained in the courts of the United States, for libellous publications, or defamatory words, touching persons holding offices or places of trust under the United States, and whether it would not be proper, if the same be sustained, to allow the parties prosecuted the liberty of giving the truth in evidence, and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DANA moved to refer this resolution to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BIDWELL said the object of the resolution appeared to be merely the appointment of a committee to inquire. If the mover would so modify it as to obtain a discussion of the principle involved in it, he should have no objection to it. It did not appear to him in order to refer a resolution for the appointment of a select committee to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. DANA insisted that the resolution was clearly in order; and that it was unnecessary to give it the form of a specific proposition to insure to the subject a full discussion in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL remarked, that if this resolution was referred to a Committee of the Whole, the only question that could be presented to them would be the expediency of referring it to a select committee, to make the proposed inquiry. The most regular and proper course was to refer the resolution in the first instance to a select committee, and afterwards to refer their report to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. J. CLAY said, that the objection made to referring this resolution to a Committee of the Whole was, that it was best to refer it in the first instance to a select committee to settle the principle. But this would be to invert the usual course pursued in the House, which was first to settle principles in a Committee of the Whole. He had understood that, in the second circuit of the United States, prosecutions and indictments had been made at common law. In times past, which he hoped would never return, a sedition law had been passed. That law gave every man accused the liberty of giving the truth in evidence. He understood that, under the common law, after an indictment was preferred, the truth was not permitted to be given in evidence; and that, under this doctrine, they would, therefore, be worse off than under the sedition law. He hoped the resolution would be referred to a Committee of the Whole to make the proposed inquiry.

Mr. BIDWELL agreed that a Committee of the Whole was the proper place for settling principles. If the resolution were framed so as to answer this purpose, it should have his approbation. But the only question, in its present form, was merely for the appointment of a select committee to investigate the subject, which investigation would be most properly made in a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. QUINCY said that the objection of his colleague seemed to be to the word inquire. Mr. Q. thought it was most proper for the House, in Committee of the Whole, to determine whether it would be expedient to appoint a select committee to inquire. If it should be decided that no such inquiry is expedient, there would be an end to the business. If a contrary decision were made, then a committee might be appointed to make the inquiry. The gentleman would not say that the resolution did not contain a principle of vast importance, well worthy of investigation. In his opinion, it was best first to settle the principle in Committee of the Whole, and then instruct a select committee on the nature of the inquiry, and the degree to which it should be made.

Mr. EPPES said, he should vote for a reference of the resolution to the Committee of the Whole, although he believed it was not draughted in such a form as it should be, to insure a discussion of the principles involved it. If he understood it, it would reduce the House to the necessity of discussing the question, which had been heretofore discussed, whether the passage of a law giving a man a right to give the truth in evidence, would abridge his rights. He could have wished the gentleman from Connecticut to have stated a specific proposition, such as that the common law of England is not a part of the law of the United States, and that in all prosecutions it is the right of a citizen to give the truth in evidence.

Mr. E. said he wished the gentleman would go further, and offer a resolution to inquire into the official conduct of any judge who had dared to institute such prosecutions as had been intimated. He would have no objection to going a step further, to impeaching him and voting for his removal.

Mr. E. said, that although he should vote for the reference of this resolution, he could not but remark that it was extraordinary for the gentleman from Connecticut to make such a motion. Suppose the gentleman were to offer a resolution for appointing a committee to inquire whether a citizen of the United States had a right to the privilege of the habeas corpus act, would not such a proposition be deemed most extraordinary? But to show that he was not afraid to meet the question, once already agitated in this country, he was ready to refer the present resolution, as well as to inquire into the official conduct of any judge who had practised the doctrines mentioned by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. DANA said, he would explain to the House the reasons which had induced him to submit the resolution in its present form. In the observations he had offered, he had avoided all allusion to the past questions which been agitated in this country. He did not wish to present the proposion, in its outset, in such a form as might give offence to any part of the House; but in such a form that the House might, after a deliberate investigation of the subject, express their opinion upon it. He had supposed it would be clearly in order, in the Committee of the Whole, to move an amendment, declaratory of principle, instead of referring the inquiry to a select committee, in case that mode should be deemed most eligible.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL did not wish it to be understood that he had any objection to the question coming before the House. On the contrary, if doubts existed of the right of the citizen in any State, who was accused, to give the truth in evidence, he hoped the question would be settled by the House. He entertained a different opinion on this subject from that which had been expressed. In a number of the States, the laws gave the individual the right of giving the truth in evidence. He had always considered the State laws on this subject binding on the Federal courts. This question had never influenced the proceedings of the courts with which he was best acquainted; and if it had affected their proceedings in other States, it was high time to settle the question. The remarks which he had made did not appear to be understood by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He did not consider the select committee, to whom it was proposed to refer this resolution, as intended to decide the principle, but to determine whether it is proper for the House to discuss it. He was clearly of opinion that the resolution should not be referred to a Committee of the Whole. It would not be there in order to settle the principle, but merely to determine whether it should be referred to a select committee. What, then, would be the effect of this course? After the report of the select committee, the Committee of the Whole must then discuss the principle. It would, therefore, contrary to the usual course, be twice discussed instead of once.

Mr. SMILIE wished the gentleman from Connecticut would present a specific proposition on the subject, which would enable the House to decide on the principle, and afterwards refer it to a select committee. This was a round-about way of doing business. The only object of the Committee of the Whole would be to inquire whether it would be proper to appoint a committee to inquire; whereas, if a specific resolution was offered, the principle involved in it might be decided in a Committee of the Whole. He trusted there was no difference of opinion on the subject in the House.

Mr. ELY did not pretend to be well acquainted with the usual mode of doing business in the House; but if he understood the object of the motion made by the gentleman from Connecticut, it was to give the committee appointed such a commission as the House, instead of the mover, might wish. If the House considered the motion as not exactly right, it would be in their power to give such commission as should be most consentaneous to their ideas. He thought this the most correct course. A gentleman draws up a resolution, which, perhaps, only in part suggests the opinions of the majority; the House then lay it before a Committee of the Whole, to modify it according to their ideas. Mr. E. thought the whole subject would be before a Committee of the Whole, and that it would be in the power of gentlemen to modify it as they pleased.

Mr. EPPES said, if he understood the object of the resolution, it presented two subjects for consideration; the first of which was, whether the common law of England was the law of the land; and the second, whether in cases of prosecution, the accused may give the truth in evidence. He thought the gentleman from Connecticut might get at his object better by two specific resolutions, than by the one he had proposed; he had drawn such resolutions, and would read them by way of argument.

Mr. E. here read the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the common law of England is not a part of the law of the United States, except so far as it has been adopted by the laws of the United States or of the individual States; and that the prosecution of a person at common law for libel is a violation of the freedom of the press, and contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

2. Resolved, That in all prosecutions, whether criminal or otherwise, it is the natural right of the citizen to give in evidence the truth.

Mr. Dana said that, in preparing the resolution which he had offered, he had endeavored to present it in the most unexceptionable form; under the impression that, when the subject was before a Committee of the Whole, it might be modified agreeably to the wishes of the majority; and where the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Virginia might be moved as an amendment to the resolutions which he had submitted. Should he agree to substitute these resolutions in lieu of his own, he might be considered as agreeing with the gentleman in every word they contained; whereas it could not be expected that he could be ready hastily to pledge himself on any specific resolution until he had maturely considered it. The gentleman from Virginia had doubtless fully considered them, and was prepared to give his vote. Without, however, pronouncing on the principles contained in them, he thought at least there was some inaccuracy in the language.

Mr. Eppes did not suppose that resolutions hastily drawn possessed all the professional accuracy which might be given to them; and very possibly they did not possess all the precision which would have characterized them if drawn by the pen of the gentleman from Connecticut. But the objection of the gentleman otherwise was not well founded. If the resolutions he had suggested were to be submitted immediately to the decision of the House, there might be some solid objection; but when it was known that the object was to refer them for discussion, they amounted to no more than an expression of the sentiments of the mover on the subject. Mr. E. said he religiously believed that the common law of England was never a part of the law of the land, and that when a man was prosecuted, he had a right to give the truth in evidence. If the gentleman persisted in refusing to modify his resolution, he would move a postponement for the purpose of introducing his own.

Mr. Speaker said, a motion to postpone had no preference over a motion to commit.

Mr. Alexander said, that the resolution under consideration, if not the most technically accurate, appeared to him the most proper for the adoption of the House. It contained two propositions—first, whether it is expedient to inquire whether the prosecuting officers of the United States have a right to institute prosecutions for defamatory language; and, secondly, if so, whether, in such prosecutions, the truth can be given in evidence? It had been objected to, because it submitted it to the Committee of the Whole to decide, whether it were expedient to appoint a select committee to inquire. The gentleman from Tennessee was of opinion that it would not be competent to a Committee of the Whole to discuss the principles of the resolution; but that they would be exclusively confined to a consideration of the expediency of appointing a select committee to make the inquiry. Mr. A. said this was not his opinion. Before the Committee of the Whole the whole subject would present itself. He added that he could conceive of a phraseology that would not contain the obnoxious term "select committee," to wit, to make the resolution read, "whether it is not expedient to inquire," &c., omitting altogether the term select committee. Would not this, however, be presenting the subject in the same point of view? And if the Committee of the Whole decided that it was proper to make the inquiry, the next step would be to appoint a select committee. Mr. A. thought the question of high importance, and the course proposed very proper. It was best to present the subject under a general view, and not in the specific form suggested by the gentleman from Virginia. He should therefore vote for the reference. He declared himself of opinion that the accused had a right to give the truth in evidence; but said he had not yet made up his mind, whether such prosecutions could be carried on by the officers of the United States.

The reference to a Committee of the Whole was then agreed to—ayes 57, noes 41; and the resolution made the order for Thursday next.

Monday, January 5.

Another member, to wit: Matthew Walton, from Kentucky, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the request of the House of Representatives, communicated in their resolution of the twenty-sixth of December, I now lay before them a report of the Secretary of the Navy on the state of the frigates, supplementary to his former report of January twenty-eighth, of the last year, communicated to the House of Representatives.

TH. JEFFERSON.

January 5, 1807.

The Messsage was read, and, together with the documents accompanying the same, ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. Roger Nelson,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations ought to be made in the militia laws of the District of Columbia, with leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. Roger Nelson, Mr. Van Cortlandt, Mr. Trigg, Mr. Blount, and Mr. Rea, of Pennsylvania.

A Message was received from the President of the United States transmitting a copy of the laws of the Territory of Michigan, passed by the Governor and Judges of the Territory, during the year one thousand eight hundred and five. The said Message was read, and, together with the laws transmitted therewith, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Parke presented to the House a petition of William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana Territory, which was received and read, praying compensation for his services in assisting to prepare the laws of the said district, previous to the first of October, 1804; and for his services as Governor and Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the same, from that period to the first of July following.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. Marmaduke Williams, from the committee appointed on the twenty-second ultimo, presented a bill to extend the power of granting writs of injunctions to the Judges of the District Courts of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. Tenney, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine and report such laws of the United States as have expired, or are near expiring, made a report, in part, thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire into the expediency of continuing in force, for a further term, the act, entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain parts of the Island of Saint Domingo;" and that they be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the discharge of William Hearn from his imprisonment. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. John Randolph, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill for the relief of Anthony Benezet, and others; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of George Little. The bill was reported without amendment and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. Van Cortlandt, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of the Highland Company, praying for the application of a part of the surplus revenue of the post office towards the completion of the turnpike road which they are engaged in executing, made a report.

The report acknowledges the high importance of the object, but gives an opinion that it is inexpedient for the Government of the United States to interfere with the making of turnpike roads.

Mr. Van C. observed that the members of the select committee were divided on the report, and moved its reference to a Committee of the Whole on Monday. Agreed to—yeas 54.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the bill to prohibit the importation of slaves into the United States.

Mr. Sloan moved to strike out the fourth section, with the view of introducing a section to the following effect: That all slaves imported into a State allowing slavery shall be declared free—for whom, food and raiment shall be provided, until they shall be restored to freedom in their native land, or removed to States in which the laws are congenial to their freedom, where they shall be bound out for a term of years.

Only three members rising in favor of Mr. Sloan's motion, it was disagreed to.

After further progress in the consideration of the report, the Committee rose, and it was postponed till Wednesday.

PUNISHMENT OF CERTAIN CRIMES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

In correspondence with the recommendation of the select committee, the third section (which gave rise to the debate on a former day) was stricken out.

Mr. Eppes moved to strike out the second section. He remarked that, in the first section, certain offences were enumerated—such as the "beginning, or setting on foot, or the providing or preparing the means for any military expedition or enterprise, with intent of taking possession of any fort, arsenal, magazine, dock, navy yard, or any public vessel of the United States; or of invading or occupying with an armed force, any part of the United States, or the territories thereof; or with intent, in any other manner, of levying war against the United States, or of adhering to the enemies of the said States; or with intent, as aforesaid, combining or conspiring together, or counselling, advising, or attempting to set on foot, provide, or prepare the means for any such military expedition or enterprise, or to procure any such military expedition or enterprise, or to procure any insurrection, unlawful assembly, or combination for such purpose."

Under the words of the second section, it is provided, "That, the trial of these offences may be had in any of the districts or territories where any of the acts constituting the offence shall be committed, and all the act constituting the offence, may be brought in evidence on such trial, in whatever part of the United States, or the territories thereof, they may have been committed."

Now, suppose, under this act, a certain set of men shall form a conspiracy in Washington, shall counsel or attempt to set it on foot in Kentucky, shall prepare the means for its execution in Indiana, and shall procure an insurrection in the Orleans Territory. Under this section, a man may be seized in Orleans and tried in Washington. If the section was susceptible of this construction, it ought to be struck out. If it were not liable to this construction, the words ought to be so modified as to render the meaning more explicit. One of the most valuable privileges secured by the Constitution, was the trial by a jury of the vicinage. Were this provision retained, it would be in the power of the Government to oppress and ruin any man charged with the offences enumerated in the act. It would be easy for it to go into distant territories, and hunt up circumstances on which to found criminal charges; but, how was it possible for the individual accused to collect information to repel them?

Mr. DAWSON said the construction given by his colleague to this section was the true one; but, that without the power given by this section, it would be impossible to punish the crimes enumerated in the bill. A man may set such a project going in Pennsylvania, and then remove to a distance, and thus commit one act in one State, and one in another. Was it not right and just that he should be brought before a court where the whole of these acts could be considered? The provision was by no means new. It would be seen, by examination of laws relative to the Post Office Department, that it had been long since adopted by the United States.

Mr. BIDWELL said he understood the ideas of the gentleman from Virginia as going much farther than the bill warranted. The first section specified certain acts, either of which were punishable, and not all of them collectively. Several of these offences were complex in their nature—for instance, a combination or conspiracy, consisting of acts, a part of which might be committed in one State, and part in another. The circumstances whose union was requisite to form a conspiracy, often took place in several counties in the same State—in which case, the principle adopted in every State made the crime triable in either county; otherwise, it would be impracticable to take into consideration the nature of the offences which constitute the crime for which the individual was charged. The case was the same in the present instance. Some part of the offence may be committed in one State, and some part of it in another. These offences might either be considered separately, and then a man would be exposed to more than one trial, or collectively, as constituting one offence, in which case there would be but one trial. For instance, one offence may be in part committed in Ohio, and part in Kentucky. Unless this offence was tried in a collective view, it would be impossible to take a full view of the whole evidence, or to punish the crime agreeably to the aggravation of the offence. Mr. B. concluded, by observing that they were only in this bill declaring, in relation to the different districts of the United States, what, agreeably to the common law, took place in the different counties of the same State; and that this provision, so far from being reprehensible, appeared to him essential to the bill.

Mr. EPPES said he believed there were no occasions on which legislative bodies ought to proceed with so much caution, as when they were about to make any changes in the criminal code. It too often happened, when they passed a law for a particular occasion, that they lost sight of the rights of the citizen, and established a dangerous precedent. It was his wish, always, to legislate on general principles, and not for particular occasions; and that they should confine themselves to the passage of such laws as might be safely administered, at all times, as the laws of the land. The gentleman from Massachusetts has confined his observations to the latter part of the objections he had made to the section, viz: the testimony to be adduced. But he would ask whether, as a candid man, he could obviate the first objection he had made? If a man committed different acts in fifty different sections of the Union, he might, under this provision, be taken in any one of them, and be tried and punished where it would be impossible for him to get testimony, and where he would be borne down by the arm of power. The language of the section is: "The trial may 'be had in any of the districts, where any of the 'acts constituting the offence have been committed." What are these acts? The first, is the beginning or setting on foot a military expedition. This is one distinct act. The forming a conspiracy or combination. This is another act. And so of any other acts recited in the bill, under which a man may be seized, and dragged here for trial, provided any one of the offences was committed here, though all the rest were committed elsewhere.

Mr. E. said he had another objection to this provision. It gave the officers a right to seize a man, and try him in that district most prejudiced against him. In one district he may be very odious, in another highly popular. He believed this was very much the case at present. Would this be fair? If gentlemen are disposed to act properly, let the offence be tried in the district where it is committed. Let them adhere to the principles of the Constitution.

Mr. E. said, that gentlemen might have an opportunity of turning their attention to the subject, he would move that the Committee should rise.

Mr. BIDWELL said, before the question was taken on the rising of the Committee, he wished for a moment to examine the nature of the objection offered by the gentleman from Virginia. The enumeration in the first section explained the different offences, and classes of offences, each of which made a different offence. The second section did not say one offence, committed in one place, should be tried in another. It is only in case of a combination of offences that this is to take place. The gentleman says, part of a conspiracy may take place in Kentucky, and part in another district. You must either then unite these offences, or render a person punishable for every part or circumstance, which collectively are made to constitute an entire whole. The having but one trial is for the benefit of the defendant, by which he is saved from the necessity of undergoing several trials in different districts and for different offences. The Constitution, it is true, provides that the trial shall be in the district in which the offence is committed; but if the offence be not committed in a particular district, Congress may fix the place where the trial shall be had. Mr. B. said it appeared to him that the true spirit of the Constitution was pursued by this law, which provides that a man may be tried in either district where any part of the offence is committed; and that when so tried there shall be a bar in any other trial for the same offence. So far from introducing a new principle, Mr. B. was of the opinion that the same course would be pursued without any special provision, which however was desirable, as making the point explicit, and placing it beyond all doubt. He said he had no other objection to the Committee rising, than that arising from delay. The sooner the bill was passed the better; for although it could not operate on past offences, if passed in season, it might perhaps operate on acts which might take place after its passage.

Mr. SMILIE said the provision in the bill had been so well explained by the gentleman from Massachusetts that he was surprised how any doubt could be entertained respecting it. It was well known that in case of treason a man might commit an act in one State, and a different act in another State. Was he in this case to be tried twice for the same offence? This would be unconstitutional. So in this case a conspiracy might be composed of various acts committed in different States. Would gentlemen be for trying the man accused of a conspiracy in different States, and for every act committed by him? Surely not.

Mr. EPPES said he would call the attention of the Committee to two clauses of the Constitution.

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed."

Mr. N. WILLIAMS said he apprehended, though he was sorry to make the observation, that the honorable gentleman from Virginia who objected to the second section of the bill, did not correctly understand it. That, according to his own understanding, the section did not contemplate the trial of distinct offences in any district or territory in which the offence should not have been committed. The words of the section are, "that the trial of the above offences may be had in any of the districts, where any of the acts constituting the offence shall have been committed," &c. By this it clearly appeared, that when the offence to be tried was made up of various acts, some of which were committed in one district and some in another, the offence might be tried in either of these districts.

Mr. W. said he should vote against the postponement, as he did not see the least difficulty in the case. The bill contained no new principle—none that was not known and applied in cases of treason, familiar to every one, and in cases of larceny, in which it was every day's practice to prosecute an offender in any county where the goods were found upon him, although stolen in another county. He said the bill appeared to him highly important, and he was sorry to discover a disposition in the House to delay the business under discussion.

Mr. ALSTON did not agree with the gentleman last up. On the contrary, he considered this section as exceptionable. What does it say? That you may try a man in one of the districts where he may have committed an offence. This was putting a power into the hands of the prosecutor to harass the accused beyond that which the Constitution even contemplated. He thought the section might be so worded as to obviate the objections that had been raised.

Mr. EPPES said it was very possible, as stated by the gentleman from New York, that he did not understand the section correctly, as he did not pretend to his high genius. His strongest objection to the section was that it gave the prosecutor a right to try the offence in the place where the strongest prejudice might exist against the accused. Mr. EPPES here recapitulated his first remarks, and added that, according to the second section, a man could be tried for any of the offences enumerated in the first section, in any one of the districts of the United States, provided any of those acts shall have been committed in it. He would ask whether this would not be a violation of the Constitution, which guarantied a jury of the vicinage to the accused? He would ask how a man could be tried here by an impartial jury collected from New Orleans, Kentucky, and Indiana?

Mr. JACKSON said that the section, according to the construction given it by his colleague, was highly objectionable, and stared the Constitution in the face, and ought not to receive the patronage of the House. He, however, believed that the object of his colleague, as well as the friends of the bill, might be effected by taking a middle course; by confining the trial of the accused to the district in which he shall be arrested. This would preclude the possibility of an individual being transported for trial from one place to another, and his being thus dragged to a place where the rage of implacable passions may condemn him though innocent. If some such amendment were not made Mr. J. said he should vote for striking out the section; and if the section should neither be amended or stricken out, he should vote against the bill.

Mr. SLOAN said that while they were so jealous of the rights of the citizens, it became them not to be indifferent to the safety of the community. He apprehended that the intention of this law was to nip in the bud plans that were treasonable and destructive of the peace of the United States. The provision contained in the second section appeared to him highly necessary to guard the rights of the community.

Mr. DAWSON said it was the opinion of the committee that introduced the bill, that a man must be tried in the district where he was apprehended, and this, he considered as the true construction. He did not think that a man could be transported from one district to another. Indeed he was at a loss to know under what legal authority this could be done. He believed this the fair construction of the law; but if gentlemen wished to make its language more explicit, he had no objection to an amendment to that effect.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL observed that the section might be so modified as to make it correspond with the ideas of both sides of the House. It was essential to fix some place for the trial of crimes, which should be partly committed in one State and partly in another. It was material to determine in which State the crime should be tried, which circumstances ought not to be left to the option of the prosecutor or the Government. If the bill was so amended, it would answer every valuable purpose for which it was framed. He therefore proposed, in case the Committee did not rise, to offer an amendment to the second section, providing that the trial should take place in the district "in which the defendant shall be arrested, or into which he shall be first brought."

Mr. EPPES withdrew his motion for the rising of the Committee, when the question was taken on his motion to strike out the second section, which was disagreed to—yeas 21.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL then offered his amendment.

Mr. JACKSON said it did not remove his objections to the section. Suppose a man were apprehended in a place where the offence with which he is accused was not committed. Would it not be competent under this provision to carry him to a place where he might be the victim of the most implacable feelings?

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL replied that the provision embraced such cases, and that the effect apprehended by the gentleman would not follow.

On motion of Mr. SMILIE, the Committee rose, without coming to a decision on the amendment when the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 6.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee appointed on the second instant, presented a bill authorizing the President to lease the public ground in the City of Washington; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. PARKE,

Ordered, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an office for the sale of the lands of the United States west of the Greenville Treaty boundary line, and east of the Vincennes and Delaware purchases; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

An engrossed bill authorizing the discharge of William Hearn from his imprisonment, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. EARLY, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were directed by a resolution of the House, of the sixteenth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of making provision for a survey of the coasts of the United States," presented a bill to provide for surveying the coasts of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. CLINTON presented to the House a petition of Peter Landais, of the State of New York, which was received and read, praying that his claim against the United States for a share of prize money, in three vessels captured by him while commander of the frigate Alliance, during the late war with Great Britain, may be examined and finally settled.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

CLAIM OF GEORGE LITTLE.

A bill for the relief of George Little was read the third time.

The bill makes provision for a claim preferred by Captain Little, commander of a ship of the United States, arising out of the following circumstances. During our differences with France, a law was passed inhibiting commercial intercourse with France. Under this law, and the orders given by the Executive Government, Captain Little captured the Flying Fish, which, on an adjudication by the courts of the United States, was restored as an illegal prize and damages awarded against Captain Little, who claims an indemnity from the Government, on the ground of having in the capture executed the orders given him by the Secretary of the Navy.

Messrs. HOLMES, TALLMADGE, COOK, DANA, HASTINGS, QUINCY, and ALEXANDER, advocated; and Messrs. SMILIE, GREGG, CHANDLER, BEDINGER, and FISK, opposed the passage of the bill, when the question was taken by yeas and nays, and the bill passed—yeas 70, nays 51, as follows:

Referred to the Committee of the Whole on Thursday.

PUNISHMENT OF CERTAIN CRIMES.

Mr. EARLY called for the order of the day on the bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

Mr. EPPES moved to recommit the bill to a select committee. He said he trusted the bill in its present shape would not pass. The object contemplated by it, was to give the same powers to prevent or punish an expedition against the United States that was already provided in the case of the expedition against a foreign Power. This would be found by consulting the Message of the President delivered at the commencement of the session. The President observes: "Where an 'enterprise is meditated by private individuals 'against a foreign nation, in amity with the United 'States, powers of prevention, to a certain extent, 'are given by the laws. Would they not be as 'reasonable, and useful, where the enterprise prepar'ing is against the United States?"

This is the recommendation of the President—this is the provision deemed necessary by him. Let us compare it with the provisions of the existing law. In the 3d volume of the laws of the United States, 5th section, we find the following provision:

"That if any person shall, within the jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory of any foreign Prince or State with whom the United States are at peace, every such person so offending, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall suffer fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court in which conviction shall be had, so as that such fine shall not exceed three thousand dollars, nor the term of imprisonment be more than three years."

This is the provision at present in force in respect to an enterprise against a foreign nation. But in addition to this the committee are for giving the following power. Mr. E. here read the first section of the bill under consideration, as follows:

"Be it enacted, That if any person or persons shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means for any military expedition or enterprise, with intention of taking possession of any fort, arsenal, magazine, dock, navy yard, or any public vessel of the United States, or of invading or occupying with an armed force any part of the United States or the territories thereof, or with intent, in any other manner, of levying war against the United States, or of adhering to the enemies of the said States, or who, with intent, as aforesaid, shall combine or conspire together, or shall counsel, advise, or attempt to set on foot, provide, or prepare the means for any such military expedition or enterprise, or to procure any insurrection, unlawful assembly, or combination, for such purpose, although such expedition or enterprise shall not be carried into effect, and whether such conspiracy, counsel, advice, or attempt, shall have the proposed effect or not; every such person or persons so offending, shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall suffer fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court in which the conviction shall be had, so as that such fine shall not exceed —— thousand dollars, or be less than —— dollars, nor the term of imprisonment be more than —— years, or less than —— years; and further, at the discretion of the court, be holden to find sureties for his or their good behaviour, in such sum, and for such term, as the said court may direct; Provided always, That nothing herein contained, shall be construed so as to prevent the trial and punishment of any person or persons guilty of treason, murder, or any other offence punishable by any law or laws of the United States."

Mr. EPPES said the objection he had to the bill was this: it introduced a description of offences which could not be defined, or reduced to any known standard. What was a combination or conspiracy, but just what a court may please to make it? He had another objection. In the first section the committee who reported the bill had adopted the very words of a statute which had ever been considered odious and oppressive, and which he never wished again to see adopted in whole or in part. He alluded to the memorable sedition act. And that gentlemen might see the affinity of this bill to it, he would call the attention of the House to its first section, which was as follows:

"Be it enacted, That if any person shall unlawfully combine or conspire together, with intent to oppose any measure or measures of the Government of the United States, which are or shall be directed by proper authority; to impede the operation of any laws of the United States, or to intimidate or prevent any person holding a place or office in or under the Government of the United States, from undertaking, performing, or executing his trust or duty; and if any person or persons, with intent as aforesaid, shall consult, advise, or attempt to procure any insurrection, riot, unlawful assembly, or combination, whether such conspiracy, threatening, counsel, advice, or attempt, shall have the proposed effect or not, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction, before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment during a term not less than six months, nor exceeding five years; and further, at the discretion of the court, may be holden to find sureties for his or their good behaviour in such sum, and for such time, as the said court may direct."

Here then we have the very offences designated in that statute, a combination and conspiracy; and all that is necessary to make this act precisely the same with the sedition bill, is to introduce the words, navy yard and arsenals.

Mr. EPPES said these were his objections to the first section. He had yesterday fully explained his objections to the second section; and although some attempt had been made to obviate them, he believed it would be impossible in a Committee of the Whole so to arrange the wording of the section as to prevent an interference of its provisions with the principles of the Constitution.

He had another ground for recommitting the bill—the entire omission of what he conceived an important provision. He would again recur to the passage. "While adverting to this branch of law, 'it is proper to observe that in enterprises meditated against foreign nations, the ordinary process 'of binding to the observance of the peace and 'good behaviour, could it be extended to acts to 'be done out of the jurisdiction of the United 'States, would be effectual in some cases, where 'the offender is able to keep out of sight every indication of his purpose which could draw on him 'the exercise of the powers now given by law."

He believed this a valuable provision, and one which might be so framed as not to infringe the rights of the citizen. If indeed the provisions of the bill were made conformable to those of the act providing against expeditions against foreign Powers, it would in his opinion suffice. That act constituted such offence a high misdemeanor, gave to the Executive the power to use the armed force for the purpose of its suppression, and authorized the binding over to good behaviour. For these reasons he hoped the motion to postpone the bill would be rejected, that the Committee of the Whole would be discharged from its further consideration, and that it would be referred to a select commitee.

The question was then taken on postponing the bill till to-morrow, which was disagreed to—ayes 44, noes 61.

Mr. EPPES then offered his motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. DAWSON said he was at a loss to know what advantages would result from such a course of procedure, unless the bill should be recommitted to a different committee from that which introduced it. It had been already recommitted; and the committee to whom it had been recommitted had reported it unanimously. As an answer to some of the objections of his colleague, he would observe that the committee, in reporting this bill, had only reported in part; and that they had it in contemplation to make the provision he had alluded to in a special bill. He did not consider it the duty of a committee to draught a bill in precise conformity to the ideas of the President, but in correspondence with their own sentiments. As to the objection that the bill was similar to the first section of the Sedition act, Mr. D. observed that if his colleague had been in the House when that bill was passed, he would have known that the section read by him had not been objected to by any one, and that it was only the second section which had been opposed. He hoped, if the bill were recommitted, it would be sent to some other committee than the one which had introduced it.

The question was then put on discharging the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill, and passed in the negative—ayes 50, noes 50, the SPEAKER declaring himself in the negative.

WEDNESDAY, January 7.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred, on the third ultimo, so much of the President's Message as relates "to a suppression of the duties on salt, to a continuation of the Mediterranean fund, and to the state of our revenues," presented a bill repealing the acts laying duties on salt, and continuing in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers:" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed on the twenty-fourth ultimo, presented a bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding thirty thousand men; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit the importation or bringing of slaves into the United States after the 31st of December, 1807.

Mr. EARLY, after some preliminary remarks, offered the following amendment: "In all actions, suits, or informations, which shall be brought under the 3d, 4th and 5th sections of this act, the burden of proof shall lie on the claimant, or party sued or prosecuted, where probable cause is shown for the seizure or prosecution, to be judged of by the court before whom the seizure or prosecution shall be tried."

After a few remarks from different members, this amendment was agreed to.

A motion was then made by Mr. BIDWELL, further to amend the third section of the said bill, in the following paragraph, to wit: "and such ship or vessel, if brought into any port or place within a State or Territory, the Constitution and laws of which permit slavery, shall, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture, be forfeited," by striking out from the said paragraph, the word "cargo."

The yeas and nays were called on the amendment, and were—yeas 39, nays 77, as follows:

Williams, Marmaduke Williams, Nathan Williams, Alexander Winston, and Thomas Wynns.

Mr. BIDWELL moved to add a proviso to the end of the 7th section, of the following tenor:

"Provided, That no person shall be sold as a slave by virtue of this act."

Messrs. BARKER, FINDLEY, QUINCY, VARNUM, SMILIE, CONRAD, SLOAN, CHANDLER, BIDWELL, BEDINGER, SOUTHARD, and FISK, supported; and Messrs. J. CLAY, ALSTON, and EARLY, opposed the amendment.

The advocates of the amendment observed that they could never agree to sanction the existing provisions of the bill, which authorized the sale of persons of color imported into the United States; that while they respected the sentiments and feelings of the people of the Southern States, so far as to be opposed to adopting any course which would be injurious to them, they claimed an equal respect for the sentiments and feelings of their constituents, which were so repugnant to slavery that no consideration whatever could induce them to give it their sanction; that nothing could be more abhorrent to their feelings than the legal authorization of the sale of persons as slaves, and the drawing money into the public Treasury from such sale; that indeed, such a provision, so far from inhibiting the trade, would in a measure tend to its encouragement; that as the bill stood, without the proposed provision, persons forfeited would be sold under the authority of the United States, a title be given to the purchaser by the United States, and the sale be for the benefit of the United States. The object of the provision was to prevent this. Its advocates declared that they did not mean by it in the least to interfere with the existing laws of the State on the subject, to turn persons of color imported loose on the States where slavery was permitted. Should the present provision be adopted, it might become necessary to recommit the bill to a select committee, for the purpose of introducing into its details a provision for the disposition of the persons who may become forfeited to the United States; that this might be done by binding them out for terms of years, or transporting them to a foreign country; and that if forfeited in States where slavery was allowed, provision might be made for their removal to States where different laws existed. The power of the General Government might not, it was admitted, be competent to their liberation in the former States; but becoming, by their forfeiture, the property of the United States, they would possess the right of removing them to those States with whose laws there would be no interference.

The opponents of the amendment contended that the plan contained in the bill was the only effectual and practicable one that could be devised for preventing the importation of persons of color; that their forfeiture to and sale by the United States was an essential provision, as, without it, no person would be found to give information of the infraction of the act; and that without such information the act would be a dead letter, as in the indirect trade with the adjacent provinces of European Powers it would be altogether impossible to render the vessel or master importing them liable to be seized, from the inability of reaching them.

They also contended that Congress did not possess the right to say that persons of color brought into the Southern States should not be sold as slaves, because as soon as they become the property of the United States by their forfeiture, the United States, in character of owner, became equally subject with an individual to those laws, which in several of the States directed their sale as slaves as soon as introduced into them; with which laws consequently the proposed provision directly interfered. They said they were also opposed to the amendment, because the principle on which it was advocated went to affect nine-tenths of the property of the Southern States, and might in its effects strike at all the property held in slaves; that consequently it became their duty to resist it. The friends of the amendment claimed an equal respect to their feelings; but this declaration came with a bad grace from those who on a former occasion had supported a motion to turn these people loose in a state of freedom in the Southern country.

This was disavowed by Messrs SMILIE and SLOAN.

The question was taken on the amendment by yeas and nays, which were—yeas 60, nays 60. The SPEAKER having declared himself in the negative, the amendment was lost. The yeas and nays were as follows:

On motion of Mr. Pitkin, the authority given the Secretary of the Treasury to remit fines and forfeiture was struck out—yeas 74.

Several other amendments were made in the details of the bill, when it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow—yeas 74.

Thursday, January 8.

Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States, of the fifth instant, transmitting a copy of the laws of the Territory of Michigan, together with the said laws, be referred to Messrs. J. Clay, McCreery, Mumford, Quincy, and Walton.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. Elliot offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House of Representatives a statement of the amount of the debt of the United States on the 1st day of April, in the year 1801, and on the 1st day of January in each year since that period respectively, distinguishing the respective amounts of foreign and domestic debt, and of each species of those descriptions of the debt, and exhibiting distinct statements of the quarterly as well as annual payments, so far as the same may be practicable.

Mr. Elliot said that, in making this motion, he had two objects, which he would distinctly state to the House: one of which, he deemed of considerable importance, and the other of minor consideration. The first and great object was to obtain an analysis of that part of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 5th of December last, which presents a general statement of the payments on account of the principal of the public debt from the 1st of April, 1801, to the 30th September, 1806, referring to a statement in the appendix to that report, marked D, and of that statement itself, to resolve, as it were, these important documents into their original elements, and present to the public eye one concise and comprehensive view of the whole of the payments that have been made on account of the national debt since April 1, 1801. It is well known that the voluminous reports of the Secretary of the Treasury on financial subjects are not generally read, or, if cursorily perused, are not studied and understood by the people at large. Few possess sufficient time which they are able to devote to this purpose, and dry mathematical calculations possess few charms to attract the attention of those who glance over the periodical publications of the day, for the purpose either of amusement or general political information. It is in vain to attempt to conceal the fact, that upon the great subjects of the national debt, and of the revenues and finances of the country generally, a degree of ignorance prevails which cannot but be the subject of great regret to all who wish for the general diffusion of correct information on all matters of national concern. It must be remarked, also, that the annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," although extremely useful for the purposes of legislation, are ill calculated for the purposes of universal information. To common readers, the simple lustre of a statement of the debt and revenue at a particular period is lost in the splendor of retrospective and prospective calculations by which it is surrounded. It becomes desirable, therefore, to obtain a general statement of the public debt, and of the payments which have been made, which may be comprised in a half sheet of paper, and will require no new calculations, as it will in fact be but a mere abstract of the voluminous documents now in existence.

The secondary object to which he had alluded, Mr. E. said, was the acquisition of information to enable the House to correct a considerable, though undoubtedly accidental error into which the Secretary of the Treasury appears to have fallen in his last annual report. And it is to this object that I wish to apply the information contemplated in the closing member of the resolution, which requires quarterly as well as annual statements of payments, so far as the same may be practicable. We have two distinct statements of the amount of the public debt at a certain period, which appear to vary from each other. In the statement marked F, in the appendix to the report, which is the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, of January 20, 1806, on the subject of a conversion of the old six per cent. deferred and three per cent stock into a new six per cent. stock, the total amount of the public debt on 1st January, 1806, is stated at $72,744,700. It is true that the unredeemed amount of the old six per cent. and deferred stocks, and the nominal amount of the three per cent. stock, are stated "in round numbers." What is meant by these round numbers is one of those things which I wish to ascertain; they may possibly account for the variance which I am about to state, but I suspect they will not. In the present report, page 4, the Secretary states the payments to be made during 1807 and 1808 (principal and interest) at $16,756,153 58, and the debt which will remain unpaid on the 1st January, 1809, at $57,491,838 77. By statement D, it appears that the amount of principal of the debt, redeemed from 1st October, 1805, to 30th September, 1806, was - - - - $3,247,113 06

And the further payments to be made during the last quarter of 1806 (see page 3 of the report) - 2.849,389 19

Making - - - - - 6,096.502 25

The amount of payments of principal for the five quarters from 1st October, 1805, to 31st December, 1806.

We have at present no means of ascertaining what proportion of this sum of six millions of dollars was redeemed in the last quarter of 1805. If we take the average of the four quarters ending September 30, 1806, as the base of a calculation, we shall have the following general result:

Amount of debt 1st January, as above - - - - - -	$72.744,700 00
Principal paid in 1806 - -	5,280,002 25
Balance - - - - -	67,464,697 75
Principal to be paid in 1807 and 1808 - - - - - -	0,714,358 25
	57,750,339 50
From which deduct the sum stated by the Secretary as the amount of the debt which will remain unpaid on the 1st January, 1809 - - - - -	57,491,838 77
The difference is - -	258.500 73

It is possible, indeed, that this variance may not amount to $150,000; and it is possible, also, that it may amount to 600,000 or 700,000 dollars. If the information aimed at by the proposed resolution be obtained, we shall be able to estimate it with perfect accuracy.

Mr. Burwell said that he approved of the resolution, but wished it extended so as to obtain information of the relative state of the debt from the year 1791, and moved to amend it by inserting 1791 in lieu of 1801.

Mr. Elliot and Mr. J. Clay suggested their indisposition to the amendment, on the ground of the delay it might occasion in acting on the bill before the House relative to the discharge of the debt.

Mr. Burwell's amendment was agreed to—ayes 87.

On motion of Mr. Alston the resolution was further amended, so as only to require quarterly statements from April 1801.

On motion of Mr. Joseph Clay it was further amended, by adding after "respectively," "on the first day of April, 1801."

So amended, the resolution was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The bill to prohibit the importation of slaves into the United States was read a third time.

Mr. Bedinger moved to recommit the bill to a select committee.

The recommitment was advocated by Messrs. Sloan, Bidwell, Findley, Quincy, Ely, Smilie, J. Clay, Gregg, Bedinger, and Alexander, and opposed by Messrs. Early, Holland, and Masters.

The advocates of a recommitment observed, that the bill in its present shape was such as they could never agree to, and that if a modification of it were successfully resisted, they would be compelled, however reluctantly, to give it their negative. They flattered themselves, however, that a spirit of harmony and accommodation, of which so illustrious an example had been set by the framers of the Constitution, would induce the friends of the bill to allow its modification in such a way as to reconcile its provisions to the sentiments entertained in the Eastern section of the Union, by which means it would go forth with the sanction either of the whole House, or of a great majority, and be thereby more likely to prove operative and effectual than if passed by a small majority.

They declared that they never could agree to that feature of the bill, which authorized the sale of persons of color introduced into the United States as slaves. They were ready to acquiesce in the principle of a forfeiture of the person, inasmuch as it had been sanctioned by the vote of a large majority, and as it appeared to be so strenuously insisted on by the representatives of the Southern country. But while they yielded their individual opinions on this point, they expected a correspondent concession on the part of the representatives of the Southern States, which was, that persons thus introduced into the United States should be disposed of in such a way as to prevent their conversion into slaves, and so as to save the United States from the humiliation and disgrace of sanctioning a principle at which the strongest feelings of humanity, as well as the plainest dictates of reason, revolted.

They remarked that the bill had hitherto been in the hands of those who were devoted to its present features; and no fair opportunity had consequently been afforded those who entertained different views on the subject to devise a plan, and exhibit the necessary details, for such a disposition of these people as would at once prevent in the highest degree their importation, and save the General Government from the ignominy of sanctioning the principles of slavery. It was added that if the bill were recommitted to a committee of seventeen members, composed of a member from each State, it was probable that a plan would be devised that would be most likely, by combining the sentiments of the several States, to meet with general approbation in the legislative body, as well as throughout the whole Union. It was incidentally observed that it might, perhaps, be found a most efficient auxiliary to the bill, to allow a bounty on the conviction of every person who should infract its provisions.

With regard to the allegation that the power of Congress to act on this subject was exclusively derived from their authority to regulate trade, that doctrine was altogether denied. Such a doctrine, it was said, was of the most dangerous complexion, as it went to sanction the principle that it was lawful for Congress to deal in human beings as an article of commerce—a principle abhorrent to humanity, and at war with our fundamental institutions, for the establishment of which we had put everything that was dear or valuable to hazard. A reference to the Constitution would expose the fallacy of the ideas of gentlemen on this head. Among the powers delegated by that instrument to Congress, was the power to "define and punish offences against the law of nations." It was afterwards added "That the migra-'tion or importation of such persons as any of 'the States now existing shall think proper to 'admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress 'prior to the year 1808, but a tax or duty may be 'imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten 'dollars for each person." Before this act could go into effect, this last provision would, in point of time, expire, and the first provision would be reinstated in full efficacy, which unquestionably gave Congress a full power over the subject, independently of that derived from their right to regulate commerce.

In addition to these arguments for a recommitment, it was observed that the details of the bill were radically defective. On examining the revenue laws of the United States, in conformity to which the provisions of the bill were draughted, it would be seen that a moiety of the cargo forfeited went to the United States, and that the other moiety went to the custom-house officers in case there were no informers, and in case of an information, one-half of the moiety to the informer, and one-half to the custom-house officers; and that consequently in the last case but one-fourth of the proceeds of the cargo went to the informer. Just in proportion to the small inducement to the informer, would probably be the lax execution of the act, and it was suggested whether in the present case it would not be best to give the whole proceeds to the informer.

Another objection to the details of the bill was that, in correspondence with the principles of the revenue laws, only three years were allowed for preferring informations; while from the nature of the case, it would be found extremely difficult to discriminate newly imported slaves from those which had been a long time in the country.

Another objection was, that in the case of an information of an infraction of this act, the importer might at any time between seizure and condemnation come forward and give bond, and take the persons imported out of the hands of the United States, and, in case of condemnation, take them on an appraisement, which might, in a part of the Union disposed to favor the traffic, be greatly below their value, and thus operate as an inducement to the traffic.

Another objection to the bill was, that it made no provision for the maintenance of the slaves that may be seized between the period of seizure and sale. Would not the collector, in whose hands they fall, experience considerable difficulty from this circumstance, uncertain, as he would be, whether they would be eventually condemned, and, if they should not be, whether the United States would indemnify him for the cost of their support?

Should this bill be recommitted, it was hoped provisions might be adopted universally satisfactory. These might consist in directing that, after the forfeiture of the persons imported, in case they should be imported into a State whose laws inhibited the manumission of slaves, they should be transported to States in which there existed no inhibition, and be there bound out for a term of years, where, it was understood, their time for a period of ten years was worth from $200 to $300.

On the other hand, the opponents of the motion to recommit the bill observed that they had indulged the hope that the enemies of the principles contained in it, after the immense consumption of time in investigating the subject, after the patient attention bestowed by the House, and the Committee of the Whole, on everything which had been urged, would have contented themselves with recording their vote against it. But it seemed that they were not contented with pursuing this course, but claimed the formation of a law satisfactory to their own peculiar ideas on the subject. Not satisfied with its being framed conformably to the ideas of those among whom it was immediately to operate, and who were alone directly concerned in it, they wished it made conformable to their own sentiments. Was this fair, liberal, or generous? Gentlemen say they have certain principles from which they cannot swerve. Be it so. They have acted like freemen; have contended stoutly in support of those principles, and have recorded their votes against them. What more can they ask?

It was asked whether this bill, passing, as it was likely to do, by a bare majority, would have the salutary effect that was desirable? It was answered that it would, inasmuch as it would receive the unanimous, or nearly unanimous, sanction of those among whom it was principally, if not exclusively, to take effect.

Gentlemen who claimed respect for their own feelings, and the feelings of their constituents, should recollect that it was impossible, on their own principles, for those who differed on this subject so widely from them, to sacrifice to a spirit of conciliation their own sentiments, when they deemed them in the highest degree important. The difference of opinion did not only arise out of the details of the bill, but struck at its principle; they lay at the foundation of the subject. Without the provisions contained in the bill, those who represented the Southern country were sincerely of opinion that the traffic could not be stopped. Believing this, gentlemen asked too much when they required them to abandon a point so essentially important.

It was remarked that the suggestion of gentlemen to give the whole proceeds of a sale to the informer was inadvertent, as it would have a very different effect from that contemplated by its proposers, by presenting a strong temptation to the importer to make use of his friends in the shape of informers, for the purposes of collusion. Such a provision would not, therefore, answer any good purpose. They maintained, however, that the inducements to an information of the infractions of the act were ample. A thousand dollars penalty was attached to the seller and the buyer; and besides this the informer was to receive a part of the proceeds of such sales as might be made. It was asked if the inducements for information under the existing revenue laws had not proved completely effectual. What reason could there then be for the apprehension that the like inducements in this case, reinforced by the other penalties provided, would not have the same effect?

If the conscience of gentlemen would not permit them to carry the proceeds of the sale of persons thus imported into the treasury of the United States, let them, if they pleased, apply them to charitable purposes—to the endowment of schools, the cutting canals, making roads, and erecting bridges.

The motion to recommit the bill was carried—ayes 76, nays 46, as follows:

CHICKASAW INDIANS.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said it would be recollected that at the last session the President had laid before the House, after its ratification, a treaty made with the Chickasaw tribe of Indians; that an act had passed the House for carrying it into effect, but had failed from a disagreement of the two Houses on certain amendments. The consequence was that the Government was unable to make the stipulated payments, and that considerable inconvenience was likely to ensue. Some of the chiefs of this tribe had been here last year; they had relinquished their land, and were greatly dissatisfied at not receiving the sums stipulated to be paid them. It was almost impossible to make them sensible of the policy of the United States on this subject. To obtain the attention of the House to the subject, Mr. C. moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision be made for carrying into effect the treaty made between the United States and the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, on the third day of July, 1805.

Referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Anthony Benezet and others. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which the House proceeded to consider, when, an adjournment being called for and carried, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 9.

Another member, to wit: MATTHEW LYON, from Kentucky, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. COVINGTON, from the committee appointed on the twenty-second ultimo, presented a bill to ascertain and provide for the salaries of the judges of the Orphans' Court in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. DAWSON presented to the House a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia, which was received and read, praying that persons summoned to serve as jurors in the courts held in the said Territory, may receive for their services such compensation as may be just and reasonable.—Referred to Mr. Dawson, Mr. John Campbell, Mr. Livingston, Mr. Cook, and Mr. Holland; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, yesterday, to the bill for the relief of Anthony Benezet and others: Whereupon, the said amendments, with the bill, were recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. Early, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill continuing in force, for a further time, an act, entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain parts of the Island of Saint Domingo," which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

PUNISHMENT OF CERTAIN CRIMES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

Mr. Bidwell said that a gentleman from Virginia, whom he did not now see in the House, had, on a former day, suggested that this bill was deficient and needed an additional section. He was of the same opinion. We have, he observed, a statute rendering it criminal to begin or set on foot or provide or prepare the means for a military expedition or enterprise to be carried on against any foreign Prince or State, in amity with the United States. For such an offence a punishment was provided, and some preventive means were authorized. The President, in his Message, had submitted to Congress the propriety of adding one further mode of prevention, by extending the ordinary process of binding to the observance of the peace and good behaviour to acts to be done out of the limits of the United States. A recognizance to keep the peace, and be of good behaviour towards the United States, was forfeited by any offence committed within the body of the United States, but not by an act done on the high seas. A hostile enterprise of any private citizens against a nation in amity with us, endangered the peace and interest of the United States. Among other means of preventing that evil, it would be useful, and might be necessary, to bring within the reach of a recognisance for keeping the peace and being of good behaviour such acts committed without the limits of the United States as would, if committed within our jurisdictional limits, be punished by the statute referred to. A provision of this kind, he thought, would properly make a part of this bill. He, therefore, moved an additional section, in the following words:

"Be it enacted, That if any person, for whose keeping the peace and being of good behaviour a recognisance shall be entered into, in pursuance of the laws of the United States, shall, during the term of such recognisance, without the limits of the United States, carry on or aid in carrying on, or begin or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means of a military expedition or enterprise against any foreign Prince or State, at peace with the United States, such recognisance shall thereby be forfeited."

Mr. Quincy said he did not perhaps understand the motion, but it appeared to him to extend to any recognisance that might be entered into, in the United States. If so, it was a very extraordinary provision, and went to affect transactions hitherto considered harmless, and even on a scene so distant as Europe or the East Indies.

Mr. Bidwell replied that his colleague had not taken a correct view of the section, which did not apply to any recognisance that might be entered into, but exclusively to those for keeping the peace and good behaviour to the United States, which recognisances would, under existing laws, be forfeited for any of the acts enumerated in the bill, if committed within the limits of the United States.

Mr. Quincy.—Suppose a merchant of the United States enters into a recognisance, goes to the West Indies, and from thence supplies either France or England, both of whom are at peace with the United States, with the means of carrying on an expedition, the one against the other; is it the meaning of the gentleman that recognisances under such circumstances should be so forfeited?

Mr. Bidwell.—The provision relates only to recognisances made under the United States, and to acts which, if committed within the United States, would be by existing statutes indictable offences.

Mr. Dwight said, that if he understood the section properly, it was as exceptionable as that already stricken out. It appeared to him to prescribe that if any individual in this country should enter into recognisance and give sureties in consequence of a certain act committed by him within the United States, and should afterwards commit other offences out of the United States, his recognisance shall be forfeited and the sureties become responsible. This seemed to him the most extraordinary attempt ever made in a Legislative body. The courts of the United States were authorized to require sureties to an unlimited amount. Were those sureties to expect that such recognisance should extend to the whole life of the person for whom they became bound, and to the other offences which might be committed by him out of the United States? Who was to determine whether these acts were or were not committed? If this was the object of the section, it was one to which he hoped the Committee would never give their consent.

Mr. N. Williams observed that he did not feel the force of the objections made by gentlemen to the amendment under consideration. He confessed, however, that he might not understand the subject well, as he was not in his place when the amendment was proposed, and had not time to examine it as he ought, to give an opinion as to its correctness. But if there was something novel, surely there was nothing inconsistent or improper in its provisions. It seemed to him as only extending that practice which was adopted, he believed, in every State in the Union, of binding citizens to their good behaviour, upon proper grounds, to cases which might arise out of the jurisdiction of the United States. And this might be proper, in order to preserve peace with foreign nations. But some gentlemen objected to such a proceeding, on the ground that the recognisance would be general, and that it might be very difficult for a citizen to find sureties against offences not particularly specified. To which Mr. W. said it might be answered, that there is no man perhaps in society, that has not some friend or neighbor, who will be bound for his good behaviour in whatever place he may be; and that if suspicion was so strong and well founded against him, as to disable him to obtain this security, the peace and welfare of the country demanded that he should be put in a place of safety. He was somewhat surprised, too, that this objection should be urged by gentlemen from Connecticut, where, if he was rightly informed (and it was detailed in the newspapers) one of its citizens was at the present time in prison for not finding sureties for his general good behaviour.

Mr. Dawson observed that this had been a subject of much difficulty in the select committee that reported the bill. It seemed to be the undoubted right of a citizen of the United States to withdraw himself from the country whenever he pleased. Under such a provision as this a man might give security for his good behaviour, and afterwards join in war with a nation against a nation at war with the United States, and thereby forfeit his recognisance. There were so many objections, Mr. D. said, to such a provision, that he could not give it his vote.

Mr. Ely said he was as willing as any gentleman to make the way of transgressors hard, provided the provisions offered for this purpose did not go to implicate innocent persons. It, however, appeared to him that the proposed provision would be extremely dangerous. If, for instance, a man in this territory, which was subject to the laws of the United States, shall enter into recognisance for any offence he may commit, in one or more sureties—if afterwards he goes into a foreign country, and there stirs up an insurrection, and on that ground his bond is forfeited, his bondsman, without expecting it, will become amenable for his conduct in this foreign country. This, he thought, ought not to be. He believed every valuable purpose of the bill would be answered without this provision.

Mr. Dana said this new section proposed giving a construction to the keeping of the peace, and to make it mean something, which it never meant before, and that in all cases whatever it should have the broad meaning proposed to be given to it—that a recognisance for keeping the peace of the United States shall be forfeited for acts that neither break the peace of the United States nor violate any law of the land. The offence therein stated could not be punished under the existing statute of the United States, inasmuch as it would not be committed within the jurisdiction of the United States or against any law of the United States. According to it, any man who shall go into foreign service, or accept a commission from a foreign Power, will violate his recognisance. It went, therefore, to create a new offence. Mr. D. said he was not willing to sport in this way with principles hitherto deemed sacred. If these acts are wrong, pass a statute for their punishment.

Mr. Bidwell said, gentlemen objected to this provision, because the act, by which the recognisance will be forfeited, was not in the contemplation of sureties when they entered into bond. He understood that a recognisance for keeping the peace was in its nature general, and that any breach of the peace operated as a forfeiture. The commission of any crime against the United States, within the United States, would work a forfeiture; the doing of either of the acts enumerated in this bill would be a violation of the recognisance. The recognisance is general, to do nothing to violate the peace of the United States. Mr. B. said he would admit, if these acts were done out of the limits of the United States, they could not at present be considered in legal estimation as against the peace of the United States. If this were the case, there would be no necessity for the proposed provision. The object of the amendment was to extend to this class of acts, committed without the United States, provisions calculated to restrain their commission, and similar to those now applicable to like offences committed within the United States. As to the difficulty suggested, of taking cognizance of offences not committed within the United States, there could not, he apprehended, be any solid objection. Was not piracy punishable under the laws of the United States? and yet it was not committed within the jurisdiction of the United States—it was committed on the high seas. So with regard to the class of offences which it was the object of this section to guard against, so far as they went to violate the peace of the United States.

Mr. Sloan was of opinion that the bill would be incomplete without such a provision as that which was offered. It had been remarked that it interfered with the right of expatriation. No one was more averse to infringing this right than he was. But he did not view it in this light. He could not consider a person bound over to his good behaviour in the light of a freeman, at liberty to do what he pleased with himself. Without giving security he would be necessarily committed to prison and be consequently deprived of his liberty; and while under recognisance, although he gave security, he was still to be considered in the light of a culprit, amenable to the law, and not possessed of the right to expatriate himself.

Mr. Dwight said the remarks of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Williams) did not apply to the point under consideration. Would a recognisance entered into in Connecticut be forfeited by any acts committed in New York, in case the person recognised in the former State should remove to the latter? So, in the case of a person bound not to commit acts within the United States; acts committed by him afterwards against a foreign Government could not be punished in the United States. If gentlemen wish to make offences against foreign nations punishable, let them make a statute to that effect, and declare that our citizens shall keep the peace, not only in the United States, but also with regard to foreign nations. But, it had been alleged that the offence to be provided against, was a moral offence. Were they therefore to punish it? As yet the moral law was not enacted under the Constitution.

Mr. N. WILLIAMS said he agreed with the honorable gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DWIGHT.) that, according to existing laws in the State which he in part represented, a citizen can be bound to his good behaviour, or to keep the peace, in the State only. And he acknowledged, that although by the laws of the United States, there is no power at present vested in the courts or magistrates, to regulate, in the manner proposed, the conduct of its citizens out of its jurisdiction, yet no one would deny that laws might be enacted to restrain them by proper obligations, from attempting injuries to foreign nations, as well as from violations of the internal peace of this country. And, if he understood rightly the proposed amendment, its object is to prevent our citizens from committing hostile acts against countries with which we are at peace. But gentlemen say, such offences are not punishable by our laws. Suppose it is so. And is it not better, if possible, to restrain offences, than to punish them, after the evils arising from them are already experienced? Mr W. thought it was. If there was no law to punish, let there be one to prevent these offences.

Mr. DANA said the right of the Government to prevent anything they could not punish was not admitted, nor was it admissible, as the one right was founded on the other. The objection to this section was this—that it undertook by a legislative construction to give a meaning to words contrary to that which they otherwise possessed—to expose a man to a forfeiture of his recognisance for acts not in themselves punishable. This was assuredly preposterous; the acts provided for by the amendment were no offences. The sureties given were only for the prevention of offences which were subjected to punishment. So long as there was no law punishing acts committed out of the limits of the United States, such a provision would be preposterous. Make such a law first, and let the punishment come afterwards.

MR. BURWELL thought the amendment a very proper one, and that the right of making it could not be questioned. As to its affecting the right of the citizen to expatriate himself, it would be found, by the decision in the case of Jonathan Robbins, that that right, as far as a judicial determination went, did not exist. If gentlemen were of this opinion, they could have no objection to the proposed section. Mr. B. however said that he had always been of opinion that every citizen had a right to expatriate himself, and to enter into the service of any other nation; and in the State he had the honor of representing a mode had been provided for the exercise of this right.

No person doubted the concurrent jurisdiction of the United States on the high seas, and that they possess the right to prohibit offences committed out of the United States was evident from the law passed at the last session, prohibiting all commercial intercourse with certain parts of St. Domingo. Whence did Congress derive this power, if the principles contended for by the gentlemen from Connecticut were correct? Again—had they not a right to prohibit the slave trade, even if carried on by citizens of the United States with foreign nations? This was not within the jurisdiction of the United States and yet no man doubted the right of the Government either to regulate or interdict the traffic. The United States therefore clearly possessed a control over their citizens wherever found, and a right to restrain them from any acts which can commit its peace, and they shall announce their expatriation; and this right extended to the punishment of certain offences committed out of their jurisdiction, as well as within it. Observe the provisions of the Treaty of 1795. It declares that whoever shall commit forgery or murder shall be delivered to the Government demanding him. Whence do the Government derive the power of demanding and punishing such an offender, if they do not possess the power of punishing offences committed by their citizens in foreign countries?

Mr. B. said this seemed to him to be one of the plainest cases imaginable, about which there could be no difficulty. It was perfectly correct that, if any citizens were suspected of a design to disturb the peace of the United States, either within or without our limits, there should exist a power to restrain such projects. The preparation and means of attack might be made or collected out of the United States, and it was indispensably necessary, in order to preserve the peace of the country and to discharge the duties devolved on us as a neutral nation, to have the power of restraining the offences committed out of the United States.

Mr. DANA said he subscribed to the correctness of the general principle laid down by the gentleman from Virginia. It was perfectly clear that within our territorial limits we had a jurisdiction over all our citizens; that on the high seas we had likewise a jurisdiction over all our citizens; and in our public vessels, over all persons on board; also that our jurisdiction extended to our merchant vessels on the high seas, and extended in a certain degree to foreign countries. This was all too plain to be controverted. No part of his argument had rested on this ground. All that he had said was, that there was no law in existence that prohibited the acts alluded to in the amendment. If it is necessary to repress such acts, make a law to punish them, and then bind your citizens in a recognisance to prevent their commission.

MR. BURWELL said he would only reply to the gentleman from Connecticut by stating, that if he and the gentlemen opposed to the amendment, would suffer it to pass, these acts would thereby become offences.

The question was then put, and the amendment carried—yeas 52, nays 43.

MR. EPPES said that, in his opinion, an amendment was requisite in the first section. In the Constitution of the United States, great pains, said he, have been taken to define treason, that our citizens may be secured from being harassed for acts which can by no fair construction be considered as treasonable. But, if, under the denomination of misdemeanors, we undertake to punish acts which scarcely admit of definition, and which are not criminal in themselves, this Constitutional restriction will be of but little avail. A party in power, in order to accomplish its vindictive purposes, will, under a different name, create the same crime, and thus evade the Constitutional provision. For this reason, Mr. E. said, he objected to the last part of the section.

Mr. E. said this part of the section was altogether unnecessary. He wished gentlemen to attend to the powers with which the Government would be armed, even if the latter words were struck out. They possessed the whole force of the nation, and could compel every man to march to maintain the public peace. If, therefore, treason should exist, they had ample power to crush it. Why, then, go farther? Will gentlemen introduce into our code a law that shall give to the courts the power of oppressing the citizen, by defining, as they may see fit, the offences of conspiracy, or of counselling and advising a conspiracy? In free countries, the greatest blessing of the citizen was, that crimes were designated by law, and that every man knew when he committed an act that was punishable. But who can tell what will be meant by conspiring, counselling, and advising? Look at England, behold the danger of constructive treason, and dread giving to your courts the power of defining crimes. For these reasons Mr. E. moved to strike out the following words:

"Or with intent, in any other manner, of levying war against the United States, or of adhering to the enemies of the said States; or who, with intent as aforesaid, shall combine or conspire together, or shall counsel, advise, or attempt to set on foot, provide, or prepare the means for any such unlawful expedition or enterprise, or to procure any insurrection, unlawful assembly, or combination for such purpose, although such conspiracy, counsel, advice, or attempt, shall have the proposed effect or not."

Mr. E. also moved to strike out the subsequent words in the same section:

"And further, at the discretion of the court, be holden to find sureties for his or their good behaviour, in such sum, and for such term, as the said court may direct. Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the trial or punishment of any person or persons guilty of treason, murder, or any other offence punishable by any law or laws of the United States."

Mr. E. said he was in favor of striking out the proviso, that the crime of treason might stand solely on Constitutional ground, and that no attempt should be made by statute to put a construction upon it. He was also in favor of striking out the preceding provision, giving the court the power of binding over for good behaviour; as he thought it just that when a man had suffered the punishment affixed to his crimes, he ought to be discharged, and as, under it, there was nothing which inhibited a court from requiring sureties in so large a sum as would confine a man for life.

Mr. BIDWELL observed that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) had founded his motion for striking out a part of this section upon an alleged uncertainty in the description of the offences rendered punishable by it. The maxim, he agreed, was a sound one, that crimes ought to be defined with such certainty as to be easily known, in order that they might be avoided by well disposed citizens; and, if committed, that they might be capable of being distinctly stated in the prosecution, and proved or disproved on trial. If the descriptive words, now moved to be struck out, would not bear the test of this rule, undoubtedly the motion ought to prevail. That was the point to be decided. The general object of the bill was, to prevent any treasonable expedition or enterprise, by punishing certain preparatory steps leading to such acts of treason, but not in themselves amounting to that crime. The gentleman from Virginia did not object to the first clause, rendering it criminal to begin or set on foot, or provide, or prepare the means for such a treasonable expedition or enterprise, which words were borrowed from an existing statute. His objection was directed against the words combine, conspire, counsel, and advise, as not sufficiently definite. He had asked, what is combining or conspiring, counselling or advising? and been answered, that it was just what a court should please to make it. On the contrary, Mr. B. said, he thought those terms had, in common use as well as in technical style, a settled and known signification. A combination, or conspiracy, was well understood to be an act of two or more persons, associating together for some object. If that object was a lawful one, the combination was innocent. If it was criminal, the combination, whether its object was effected or not, was, at common law, a crime well defined, and understood as an indictable conspiracy. The words counsel and advise, also, were explicit and unequivocal. To counsel or advise the doing of anything, was an overt act, which might be known, stated, proved, and tried with as much certainty as any other act whatever. And, when its object was a treasonable expedition, or enterprise, it was in its nature criminal, and merited punishment as much as any act short of treason itself; for it might be a cause, and perhaps the principal cause, of the whole mischief. A man by his advice, without any further agency, might induce others to set on foot, or provide and prepare means for such an enterprise as was intended to be guarded against by this bill, and ought to be punishable for it, if any preparatory steps towards treason was a proper ground of punishment. As these descriptive terms, to which the gentleman from Virginia had objected, did not appear to him to be liable to the objection of uncertainty in their meaning, Mr. B. said he should not, without some further reason for it, vote in favor of the proposed amendment.

Mr. EPPES said the gentleman from Massachusetts had virtually admitted every objection which he had taken to the section. He says that a conspiracy is a thing which every court and jury may easily decide upon. This was precisely his objection—that they would be obliged to leave the decision to the court and jury. The terms were incapable of legal definition. The gentleman says, suppose there should be a conspiracy, or a counselling towards it, will you let those concerned in it go clear? Why not? What great injury will flow from it? You will be precluded from punishing words or intentions, but will that be an evil? Do gentlemen recollect the length to which constructive treasons have been carried in another country? Do they remember that a man was convicted of treason in England for wishing a buck's horns in the belly of the King? To show gentlemen how far courts have gone, even in our own country, Mr. E. said he would refer them to the case of Luther Baldwin; and, as he had the indictment in his hand, he would read it in illustration of his argument.

Mr. E. here read the indictment, as follows:

"New Jersey District—U. S. Court.

"INDICTMENT OF LUTHER BALDWIN FOR SEDITION.

"District of New Jersey, ss:

"The jurors in behalf of the United States of America, for the body of New Jersey, district of the middle circuit, upon their respective oaths present, that Luther Baldwin, late of the township of Newark, in the county of Essex, and district of New Jersey, waterman, being a pernicious and seditious man, and contriving, and maliciously intending the faithful citizens of the United States to excite and move to hatred and dislike of the person of the President of the United States and the Government established within these United States, on the 27th day of July, in the year of our Lord, 1798, in the township within the county and district aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, in the presence and hearing of divers faithful citizens of the United States with whom the said Luther Baldwin was then and there talking of and concerning the President of the United States, (the President of the United States being then and there passing on the highway, through the township within the county and district aforesaid, and divers faithful citizens of the United States, in testimony of their respect and affection for and towards the President of the United States being then and there firing a cannon,) unlawfully, maliciously, and wickedly did publish, utter, and declare, with a loud voice, these English words: 'The President' (meaning the President of the United States) 'is a damned rascal, and ought to have his' (meaning the President of the United States) 'a— kicked. I wish one of the charges' (meaning then and there firing and discharging as aforesaid from the cannon as aforesaid) 'would pass through his' (meaning the President of the United States) 'a—.' And the said Luther Baldwin, in further prosecution of his malice towards the said President of the United States before had, afterwards, to wit: on the same day and year aforesaid, at the township in the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, maliciously, diabolically, seditiously, wickedly, and scandalously, in the presence and hearing of divers faithful citizens of the United States then and there present, did utter, and with a loud voice pronounce, assert, and affirm, that the President (meaning the President of the United States) 'was a damned rascal, and ought to have his a— kicked, and one of the cannon shot through it,' (meaning that the President of the United States ought to have his a— kicked, and ought to have one of the cannon then and there firing as aforesaid shot through his a—,) to the great scandal and contempt of the President of the United States and Government thereof, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, and against the peace of the United States and the Government and dignity of the same.

"LUCIUS H. STOCKTON,
"U. S. Attorney."

I have called the attention of the House, said Mr. E., to this paper, to show that all courts are alike; that if you give them power they will abuse it; and that there is no safety for man but in a clear definition of crimes by law. In free countries there ought to be no crimes not defined by law. The gentleman tells us conspiracy and counselling are plain terms, easy of apprehension. But I wish to trust to nothing short of the law of the land. Let them be defined.

Mr. ELLIOT hoped the motion of the gentleman from Virginia would prevail. A part of the words in this section ought certainly to be erased; and he believed it would be better to erase the whole. On the subject of constructive treasons sufficient had been said. But it appeared to him that the provisions in the bill were such as led to another species of construction which was more objectionable than the doctrine of constructive treasons. He meant that doctrine which had prevailed at an early period of the British history—the doctrine of accumulative treasons—which consisted in making a number of offences, neither of which in itself amounted to treason, or any other crime of magnitude, collectively amount to treason. Under this doctrine, the celebrated Earl of Strafford, and other distinguished men, had suffered. Mr. E. said he was of opinion that every valuable purpose of the bill would be better answered without than with these words, without introducing a provision of the most dangerous tendency. After illustrating this idea, Mr. E. added, if you once say that a person who shall counsel or advise the setting on foot a military expedition shall be liable to punishment for a misdemeanor, you create a new system of jurisprudence. How liable will the individual accused be to be misunderstood and misrepresented? I hope never to see this doctrine recognised—that mere words, the impulse of the moment, without any definite object, and uttered without reflection, shall be tortured into a misdemeanor.

After a few remarks from Mr. JACKSON, Mr. PITKIN, and Mr. ALEXANDER, in favor of the motion, and Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL against it, the question was put and the motion to strike out carried—yeas 68.

Mr. EPPES then moved to amend the second section by striking out the following words in italic:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the trial of the abovementioned offences may be had in any of the districts or Territories where any of the acts constituting the offence shall have been committed, and all the acts constituting the offence may be brought in evidence on such trial, in whatever part of the United States, or the Territories thereof, they may have been committed."

Mr. E. said, on examining the provisions of the Constitution, this part of the clause appeared to him a clear and open violation of it. He would invite the attention of the House to the several provisions that bore on that point. In the second section of the third article are the following words:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

In the seventh amendment we find—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service."

And in the next amendment the following provision:

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

From these provisions, it appears to me, said Mr. E., that every man charged with an offence is secured in the right of not being tried except on the previous presentment or indictment of a grand jury; and, on the known principle of a grand jury, they are incapable of finding except for acts committed in the State where they meet. Suppose a man commits acts in Maryland, in Delaware, and Pennsylvania—that they are criminal acts, and that he is arraigned in Pennsylvania for the act committed in that State. On that arraignment, can the acts committed in Delaware and Maryland be given in evidence? No. Why? Because the Constitution of the United States declares he shall not be made to answer but on a presentment of a grand jury, who cannot wander out of the State in which they sit. If he should be tried in Pennsylvania for acts committed in Delaware and Maryland, I ask if he can be said to be tried on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury of those States? I know, when part of an act constituting an offence is committed in one State and part in another, the quo animo may be shown in one State by acts committed in the other. But the Constitution expressly provides that a man shall be arraigned and tried in the State where the offence shall be committed. I know the answer that will be given to these remarks. Gentlemen will talk of convenience, and say, that without such a provision as this, persons cannot be tried. But in these cases we are not to legislate on the principle of convenience. This is a Government of delegated powers, and we have no powers that are not given. I pretend not to professional knowledge on this subject. If the provision can be so modified and arranged as to steer clear of a violation of the Constitution, I will agree to it; but, in its present form, it appears to me unconstitutional.

Mr. ELLIOT seconded the motion. The arguments offered by the mover appeared to him unanswerable, and it was not necessary to repeat them. He would, however, offer one or two additional observations. The words proposed to be stricken out in this section had a close relation to those already stricken out in the first section. Had the latter been retained they would have been an argument for retaining the former. But since the first section was thus amended, they appeared to him perfectly useless. How could it be necessary to provide that all the acts committed in different States should be given in evidence, when, as the bill stood, the offences enumerated embraced entire and individuals act?

Mr. EARLY said he differed in opinion essentially from the mover and seconder of the amendment; both of whom, he apprehended, had fallen into error, from confounding two things which were in their nature essentially distinct. He understood the section as meaning neither more nor less than this—that different acts constituting one and the same offence may all be given in evidence on the trial of that offence; not that different acts constituting different offences shall all be given in evidence on the same trial. The term in the section, the offence, can only allude to one offence. This he considered perfectly Constitutional and correspondent with every day's practice. He would put a familiar case. Suppose a murder committed in the State of Virginia, and that the person who committed it shall have previously purchased a gun and loaded it in Maryland. The purchasing and loading the gun are preparatory to the act of shooting. And yet, according to the doctrine of gentlemen, these are distinct facts and cannot be given in evidence in Virginia. Mr. E. said he was willing to rest the provision on this ground; as proof that all the acts constituting one and the same offence could be given in evidence.

Mr. ELLIOT replied that the gentleman from Georgia had not steered clear of the error he had ascribed to the mover and seconder of the motion. He says the purchasing and loading the gun are distinct acts from that of shooting. True; but they are in themselves no part of the offence. The act of shooting alone constituted the crime, and must have been committed within the jurisdiction of the tribunal trying it.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said the amendment was principally founded on the constitution of the grand jury, inasmuch as that body did not possess the power of making presentments, except for offences committed within their jurisdiction. When the amendment to the Constitution was attended to, it would be found that it did not bear on this point. It secures to the individual the right of not being tried by a petit jury until a grand jury shall have found a bill against him. Now, the question is, what evidence may be given of the offence? I entertain no doubt, said Mr. C., but that any evidence may be given to the grand jury to ascertain the offence, if part of it has been committed within the district, and that this will give them jurisdiction. If this were not the case the most palpable absurdity would follow. Complete evidence of the commission of a crime cannot be collected without showing the steps to its consummation. The consequence therefore, would be, that many crimes would escape unpunished.

Suppose a man to steal a horse in one State, and to be taken up with him in another. It has been decided that he may be indicted in the last, although the crime was committed in the first State. Would not the grand jury be allowed to receive evidence of the stealing of the horse in another State? Mr. C. said he had seen such evidence frequently admitted; indeed he had never heard it questioned. For these reasons he thought the words ought not to be stricken out. He would add that, although he was against striking them out, he did not believe them absolutely necessary, as he believed the same power would exist without the provision.

Mr. Alston said if the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee were correct there was no necessity whatever for the words proposed to be stricken out. He would ask, if these offences could be tried in the same manner without this provision, whether the bill would not be better without it? If such a provision were now required, it would go a great way to prove all the similar practice heretofore adopted illegal. For these reasons he was willing to strike it out.

Mr. Eppes said he believed, from several of the arguments used, he had not been correctly understood. He had not said that the commencement of such an act as murder could not be given in evidence. But was such a crime divisible? What, on the contrary, were the acts specified in the bill? They were the beginning or setting on foot, or providing or preparing the means for a military expedition. These might be divided. For instance, take one of them; suppose a military expedition set on foot in Maryland—the preparations for carrying it on made in Delaware, and the attack made in Pennsylvania. Here were three acts; and if a man is indicted for one of them in Pennsylvania, I say he cannot be indicted for the same offence in Delaware or Maryland, because they are distinct offences, and the Constitution says a man shall not be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb. I ask then, whether, if a crime be committed in Pennsylvania, the giving in evidence an act committed in Maryland would not be a violation of the plain principles of the Constitution?

Take an offence as a whole, one-sixteenth part of which is committed in one place, and fifteen-sixteenths in another, all of which are required to constitute it. I ask gentlemen whether they mean to introduce the doctrine of crimes made up of fractional parts, or whether they are in favor of establishing a principle under which the party in power may hunt up circumstances committed in this State and in that State, neither of which in itself would constitute a crime? This is the first time I ever heard of the doctrine of the fractional parts of a crime; by which a man, who, although he has committed no crime in any one State, yet, by adding together the fractional parts committed in this State, and the fractional parts committed in that State, may be convicted and punished.

Mr. Hastings spoke in favor of the amendment.

Mr. Alexander was opposed to striking out these words, as he feared without them the bill would be perfectly nugatory. It might, perhaps, be safe to say that the courts had the power assigned them by the section; but the provision seemed necessary to put the point beyond question. The reasoning of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Eppes) went to prove that the acts enumerated in the bill consisted of several things, from the combination of which the crime was constituted. He would ask whether, on a trial of any crime whatever, it was not usual to receive everything constituting the offence, provided jurisdiction over it was given to the tribunal before which trial was had? In State prosecutions, if the offence was begun in one county and consummated in another, it was competent to the court to try an individual wherever he was arrested. If a man should take a horse from Tennessee to North Carolina, it was questionable whether he could be arrested and tried in North Carolina; because in every such offence we find the charges in the indictment consist in stealing and carrying away; and notwithstanding what had been observed by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. A. said, he recollected a case in which a man, who had taken a horse from Tennessee to North Carolina, had got clear on this ground. Mr. A. however, said, that the making the law clear on this point was a sufficient reason for the section. If the doctrine contended for by gentlemen obtained, it would be impossible for these offences to be punished at all. Suppose a combination should take place in Virginia, and in Pennsylvania the means should be prepared for effecting it. The offence would be punishable in neither State. The mere bringing was an innocent act. It was, therefore, necessary to prove the intention with which they were brought. Would not this evidence be received? If not, the culprit would go clear altogether.

Mr. Holland said he was in favor of striking out these words on two grounds; because the first of them was unnecessary, as the Constitution had provided that offences shall be tried in the States where they are committed; and because the second part was in his opinion altogether improper, inasmuch as it was unconstitutional. The acts provided for in the first section were entire acts, and could be punished wherever they were committed. Offences were, from their nature, not divisible.

Mr. G. W. Campbell observed that it was objected, by the gentleman from Virginia, that this section went to divide crimes into fractions. Mr. C. said he was himself of opinion that no plan could be mentioned that did not consist of certain ingredients; and that, from the nature of things, one act could not constitute a crime. The act of shooting a gun, which had been alluded to, was in itself no crime without a criminal intent. All crimes consisted of a congregation of acts, which went to show the intent of the individual committing them. This was the first time that he had ever heard a doctrine espoused under which a culprit could by address screen himself from punishment. All that would be necessary for him to do, would be to begin the commission of an offence in one State and commit a part of it in another. What say gentlemen to this? Why that there is no such thing as fractional crimes! Although the crime is made up of the acts committed in several States, you shall only punish the perpetrator in each State for the acts done in the State. This is a dangerous principle, much more dangerous than the principle proposed to be adopted. If this principle be correct a man may laugh at your laws, break them at pleasure, and so manage, by removing from one district to another, that you cannot reach him.

Mr. Fisk hoped the words would be stricken out. He considered them not only useless, but worse than useless. In one respect they were unconstitutional, and in another respect they rendered that doubtful, which was previously clear. He said he never before had heard that crimes consisted of fractional parts. He did understand that the evidence of the existence of crimes might be drawn from different sources; but not that the crimes themselves consisted of different fractions.

Mr. Eppes said that on examining the first part of the section he thought it equally exceptionable with the last. His wish was, therefore, to strike out the whole section. But, as he could not effect this purpose in committee, as certain words had been inserted which it was not in order to move to strike out, he would withdraw his motion; and move in the House that the whole section be stricken out.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill, and the House adjourned.

Monday, January 12.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from Augustus B. Woodward and others, appointed a committee by a Convention of the inhabitants of the Territory of Michigan, held at Detroit, on the twenty-seventh of November, one thousand eight hundred and six, transmitting an authenticated copy of the proceedings of the said Convention; which were read, and referred to Mr. Jeremiah Morrow, Mr. Gregg, Mr. Elliot, Mr. Thomas W. Thompson, and Mr. Philip R. Thompson; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. Dawson, from the committee appointed on the thirtieth ultimo, presented a bill to incorporate a company for making a turnpike road from the west end of Mason's Causeway to Alexandria; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. Early, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to annex certain shores and waters to the district of Mississippi; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. Early, from the same committee, presented a bill for the relief of Edmund Briggs; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. Early, from the same committee, presented a bill authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. Lattimore, from the committee appointed on the ninth ultimo, presented a bill authorizing a grant of land for the use of a hospital at Natchez; allowing an additional compensation to the Judges of Mississipsi Territory, and extending the right of suffrage therein; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. Varnum presented to the House a representation of William Hull, Governor of the Territory of Michigan, which was received and read, stating that, during the last Winter, hostile indications appeared on the part of different nations of Indians against the settlements within the said Territory, which rendered it necessary to make defensive preparations for their safety and protection, and that, in so doing, very considerable expenses were incurred, and praying that an appropriation may be made to defray the same.—Referred to Mr. Varnum, Mr. Matthew Clay, and Mr. Rhea, of Tennessee; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. R. Nelson, from the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as related to fortifications, &c., reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a sum of money, not exceeding —— dollars, be appropriated to enable the President of the United States to cause fortifications to be improved and repaired.

Resolved, That a further sum of money, not exceeding —— dollars, be appropriated to enable the President of the United States to cause to be built a number of gunboats, not exceeding ——, for the better protection of our ports, towns, and rivers.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next, and ordered to be printed with the accompanying documents, the New York memorial excepted.

DUTIES ON SALT.

Mr. J. Randolph moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for "repealing the acts laying duties on salt, and 'continuing in force the first section of an act, 'entitled an act further to protect the commerce 'and seamen of the United States against the 'Barbary Powers."

Mr. Quincy moved to postpone the consideration of the bill until Friday next. He said that the effect of this repeal would ruin a great number of persons in Massachusetts engaged in the salt manufacture, and crush that important establishment. He had daily expected communications upon the subject, enabling him to state more fully than he was then able, the importance of that interest, and to show the inexpediency of the repeal; that the bill and documents were only laid on the table on Friday. It was an important national concern; no possible injury could result from delay—it being six weeks to the end of the session.

Mr. J. Randolph replied that the manufacturers had notice enough the last session. The subject had then been defeated. The intention of this House was then sufficiently expressed, and that the Message of the President had given ample notice to all concerned, to come forward with any petitions, or send on any information. He hoped the bill would not be postponed, but that the House would immediately resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill.

Mr. Quincy said, that all the evidence resulting from the conduct of the House the last session was, that the tax would not be repealed, as it was then negatived. That it was unprecedented to enter upon such a bill as this so early in the session, especially if any light was likely to be obtained by postponement. It was desirable the House should have all the information in the case; and although, out of regard to the salt manufacturers, the House might not deem it politic to refuse to repeal this tax, it would at least afford the persons interested some consolation to know that the House had given them an opportunity to offer all they had to urge.

The question of postponement was lost—ayes 33, noes 65.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill—Mr. Varnum in the Chair.

The first section provides that all the acts imposing duties on salt shall be repealed after the —— day of —— next.

At the instance of Mr. J. Randolph the blanks were filled with the first of July.

The second section repeals several acts heretofore granting bounties on, and allowances for, the benefit of the fisheries.

The third section continues the ad valorem duties, which constitute what is called the Mediterranean fund, till the end of the next session of Congress.

Mr Quincy moved to strike out, and insert so as to make the section read:

"That, from and after the first day of July next, so much of any act as lays a duty on imported salt, bohea, souchong, and other black teas, brown sugar and coffee, be, and hereby the same are, repealed, and that, from and after the said first day of July next, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on each of said articles the following duties, viz: on salt —— cents per bushel, on bohea tea —— cents per pound, on souchong, and other black teas —— cents per pound, on brown sugar —— cents per pound, and on coffee —— cents per pound."

He said if the motion were adopted he should move to fill the blanks so as to effect a reduction on salt eight cents per bushel, on bohea and other teas, six cents per pound; on brown sugar, half a cent, and on coffee one cent per pound. The amount of this reduction would about equal the amount of taxes, which, according to the President's Message, might be spared.

Considering the deep injury which would be done by a total abolition of the salt tax to a certain portion of the citizens of Massachusetts, he felt it his duty to submit to the House to consider whether the same relief might not be effected to the people in another way, and instead of a total repeal of the salt tax, which would ruin the manufacturers, to adopt a partial repeal on that article, and equalise the reduction on other articles of the first necessity. If by this means the encouragement to the manufacturers might be retained, and an equal benefit result to the people, he thought it was a great national object. By leaving the salt tax at twelve cents, which he proposed, the manufacturers would be saved; and the proposed reduction on the remaining articles would amply compensate the people for the residue left upon salt. The articles he had stated to be reduced were the lower species of tea, coffee, and brown sugar, all of them articles of the first necessity—necessaries of life to the poor and laboring classes, particularly in the cities. This circumstance had a great weight with him, in addition to the consideration from the encouragement of the salt manufacture. A total abolition of the duty on salt would have the effect of giving the chief portion of relief to the interior, to the South, and West, and comparatively very little to the seaboard. It was a principle of wise legislation, that when you lay taxes, equalise the burden. I suppose the converse is also true, when you take off taxes, equalise the benefit. It is an unquestionable fact, that this salt tax bears peculiarly hard upon the Southern and Western States; not only is this evident from their anxiety to get it repealed, but also from the known state of things. They have cattle as well as we, and besides they have slaves. This tax is to them, therefore, all the difference of the consumption of their slaves. This fact was so strong, that at the time of the first imposition of the salt tax, the argument principally relied upon against it was this inequality. The answer to this objection, as it was urged by the advocates of the tax, particularly by Mr. Madison, the present Secretary of State, is remarkable. They admit the inequality, but urge that "considered as part of a system the equilibrium is restored when you" (the Western States) "find this almost the only tax you have to pay." It is impossible that the interior of any part of the United States can consume anything near the proportion, compared with their numbers, of the inferior teas, brown sugars, and coffee, as are consumed on the seaboard. These make a most important and capital article of the expenditure of laborers, artisans, and poor of the cities, supplying the place of milk, and the products of the dairy, which support the same classes in the interior. The salt they consume is comparatively little. Now, if in the original imposition of duties, articles were so selected as to equalise the tax upon the consumption, so that all consumers might be equally burdened, in taking off the taxes we ought to take care "not to destroy the equilibrium of the system." So to arrange the reduction, that all may share the advantage of the relief. The tax upon salt is indeed a tax upon a necessary of life; but is of all those species of tax the easiest to be borne. First, because it is consumed a little by all, and cannot, as a necessary, be consumed a great deal by any. Next, because its cost abroad is very trifling, and the increase in the price, by the tax, cannot materially be felt. Next, the consumption is gradual and imperceptible, and so the tax is gradually paid. So far as salt is eaten by cattle and by slaves, it is a tax upon property. And really, sir, I do not believe that a tax upon property is the first tax to be totally repealed. Davenant, and other writers upon this subject, estimate the consumption of England to be annually half a bushel a person, and the amount of this article imported into the United States, compared with the population, will show that is the average amount of consumption here. Supposing this to be correct, and it cannot be materially erroneous, then the salt tax is a tax upon the poor of ten cents annually. But what is it upon the rich? The farmer with an hundred head of cattle, and the planter with a hundred slaves, each of which also consume half a bushel of salt annually, pays ten dollars of this tax. And will any man pretend that farmers and planters, who are able to keep this stock in cattle or slaves, are the first to experience the charity of the national reduction? As far as the tax operates on the intermediate class of farmers and planters, it operates in proportion to the stock they keep. A poor farmer, with a single cow, pays ten cents, and so in proportion to the cattle he owns; in other words, in proportion to his riches. I do not contend that relief should not be extended to farmers and planters by a reduction on this article; all I maintain is, that it shall not exclusively be granted. Let us leave a share of the benefit on the seaboard. The tax upon the poor of the cities, on the articles I have proposed to insert, is as hard as the tax upon salt is on the interior. Do not take ten dollars from their annual tax, and only ten cents from ours, but so modify your measures that we may have a little more of the reduction, and they a little less. When I consider that this plan will not only be more equal, but will, by leaving twelve cents tax upon salt, preserve to the country a most important manufacture, I cannot but hope it may receive the sanction of this House.

Mr. J. Clay.—The gentleman from Massachusetts has observed that tea, coffee, &c., have become necessaries of life. This is true. But by the duty on coffee, a large sum is saved from the smallness of the drawback allowed in case of exportation. This sum amounts to about $75,000 annually, but if you diminish the duty on coffee, you proportionably lessen the sum thus saved to the revenue. Little salt is re-exported; you will not, therefore, suffer in this way from a repeal of the duty upon that article.

The duties on salt are now equivalent to a poll-tax of ten cents for each person. But the great evil of the tax is, that it raises the price in the interior of the country, where the article is manufactured. In the western parts of Virginia and in Kentucky, it is three dollars a bushel. This is certainly too high. But the duties on bohea tea are so small (13 to 17 cents a pound) that I can hardly believe the gentleman serious in his proposition. To bring forward an amendment so overhead-and-ears into the bill, seems as if it resulted more from looking after popularity, than a belief that the proposition would be adopted by the House.

Mr. Elliot wished to be indulged while he took a rapid and general view of the history of taxes on salt. They originated in the Roman Republic, which did not well understand the principles of commerce. They had a powerful agency in promoting the French Revolution. The gentleman, (Mr. Quincy,) the last session told us, with an eloquence not every day witnessed in this House, that a large proportion of the people of the Eastern States lived upon the water, and came on shore only once or twice a year. Hence, they will be particularly benefitted by a repeal of the duty, for seamen are almost entirely subsisted on salted provisions. The British writers say that the duty on salt has been very injurious to the fisheries in that country, and the same effect must be produced here. The repeal of no tax will so generally relieve the people as this. When that is done, it may be proper to consider whether any other taxes can be dispensed with.

Mr. J. Randolph.—I conceive that the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is brought forward in order to avoid the lessening of any tax whatever. He will excuse me for this declaration, but I infer it from what the gentleman himself said on the question of postponing the bill. He informed the House that it was the general belief, in that quarter of the country from which he comes, that all the present taxes were wanted by the Government.

The gentleman perceives that the repeal of these duties is a favorite measure of the majority of this House, and not being able to meet the subject fairly he tries to elude it. Sir, this is no new expedient. Six years ago, on the question of repealing the internal taxes, an attempt was made to elude the object by a proposed repeal of the duties on sugar, salt, bohea tea, and molasses. There is now an attempt to play the same game over again.

The question lies in a very narrow compass. It is a simple question of finance. Can you do without the duty of $500,000? If you can, it is to me self-evident that salt is the article to be relieved. I state the very reason in favor of the repeal which the gentleman urges against it—locality. The taxes operate locally, and ought for that reason to be taken off. Suppose there were an article of great use in the Eastern States, and not used elsewhere—a necessary of life—and taxed higher than any other object of taxation.

The gentleman would say take it off, because the burden operates locally. But can he point out in your book of rates an article so highly charged as salt—an article, not a superfluity, but a necessary of life? The tax falls hard on certain classes, and also on certain districts, at a distance from the sea, where the expense of transportation is considerable. Salt, iron, coarse woollens, and linens, are the great necessaries of life.

I have another reason. I want to see the commencement of a general repealing system of your taxes. No man is more an advocate for the speedy reduction of the national debt than I am, but I wish the reduction of the debt, and the repeal of the taxes, to go on together. I hope to see the time when all the taxes of the General Government shall be repealed, except a small ad valorem duty of five per cent.

Messrs. Smilie, Bidwell, and Findley, spoke against the amendment.

Mr. Sloan.—I do not rise to take up the time of the House, but to express briefly my sorrow that so much time has been already taken up. The gentleman (Mr. Quincy) will pardon my plain mode of reasoning, but to my mind there cannot be any objection at all on the subject, and I wonder that there should even be any doubts upon the case. I confess, however, there is one circumstance I have a feeling for. I understand there are many factors of salt who have laid out great sums in making salt works. If the gentleman will bring forward any plan for their assistance, as granting a bounty or the like, I shall be willing to go his pace.

Mr. Quincy.—Gentlemen are not content with replying to my arguments; they impeach my motives. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Clay) says, my "object is popularity." That gentleman does not know the relation in which I stand. The great mass of salt manufacturers are not residents in my election district. And if they were, I cannot see that it is a reason against proposing a wise measure that it may possibly be grateful to the people. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. Randolph) says, "it is the old game played at the repeal of the internal taxes, and that the object is to prevent any repeal." Is this a fair suggestion, when my system is expressly founded upon affording the same amount of relief, and my only difference at present is, as to the mode in which it shall be distributed among the people? I will explain to those gentlemen my real motives. It was to bring on a discussion. I saw this House going into Committee of the Whole and out of it, with a haste that was, considering the importance of the consequences to the nation and individuals, unexampled. A great and growing manufacture was about to be crushed, and no one seemed to take any concern for it. No man opened his lips in its support. In this state of things, I felt it my duty to propose a plan which would save the manufacturer, and yet not counteract the strong current which is setting in this House towards repealing of taxes.

As to the objection made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Clay) from the drawback on coffee, there may be some force in it so far as respects that article; but that is not material; if the House agree to the general principle, the details may easily be arranged.

As to the objection of the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. Elliot,) that, by repealing the tax partially on salt, we lose the bounty to the fishermen, I do not see how that applies. The bounty is now to be repealed by this act. If a partial tax should be imposed, unquestionably a proportionable bounty would be granted. If I did not know that the interests of the fisheries would have no weight upon this floor, I would urge that interest against the total repeal of the salt tax. The present rate of bounty is unquestionably somewhat beyond the amount of salt exported. It is only a little excess, but that little is an encouragement. Were I not assured that an argument of this kind would be more than useless, I would urge the interest of the fisheries further in detail.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. Randolph) admits the partial operation of the salt tax, and says it is a reason for the repeal. It may be a local reason, but is it a national one? If your present system be so constructed as to make the great consumption of one article in one part of the country balance the great consumption of other articles in another part of the country, is not a policy which takes the whole tax from one, and nothing at all from the other, as unwise as it is partial?

But I will not detain the Committee on a subject which I perceive is irksome. I will only ask, are you quite certain that by a total abolition of the salt tax, you effect all the relief to the people you contemplated? Experience has shown what the article will bear in this country. Suppose Great Britain should deem this a favorable moment to lay a tax upon the export? Are gentlemen quite certain it will not happen? It will be recollected that two-thirds of our whole import of salt is from her dominions; that this article is not like others, the direct object of commerce, generally, but only taken from necessity, either as ballast or for want of a return cargo. An export duty might not operate, possibly, to turn the merchants to other ports for the article. It may be found that they had better pay the duty in their ports than to go elsewhere. Are gentlemen prepared with any argument to show this cannot be the policy of Great Britain? and if it be, a very small duty in Europe would soon, by the ship and merchant charges, equal the proposed amount of twelve cents on the consumer in America.

Mr. J. Randolph called for a division of the question. The question was accordingly put, on striking out of the bill so much as repeals the whole of the duty on salt, for the purpose of substituting a partial repeal of the duty on salt, souchong, and other black teas, and coffee, and a total repeal of the duty on bohea tea—ayes 7. So the question was lost.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill with amendments.

Mr. Dana called for the reading of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to ascertain the amount of the Mediterranean fund, in order that it might be known how much the people were relieved by the bill before the House.

The report being read, it appeared that the duties repealed by the bill, amounted to $500,000, and the duties imposed amounted to $1,000,000.

Mr. Dana observed that he should like to know why the 3d section, which imposes the additional ad valorem duties, is retained? The duties were continued the last year in consequence of an intimation from the President that some menaces had been thrown out by the Tunisian Ambassador, or some demand of tribute made, or something of that sort. It is not pretended that these additional duties are wanted for the purposes of defence. There is no pretence that they are wanted for the extraordinary two millions voted last session. Mr. D. concluded by moving to strike out the 3d section of the bill.

There were immediately loud and reiterated calls for the question.

Mr. Dana.—The Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter to the committee who reported this bill, says that the only object in continuing this duty is to provide for the extraordinary two millions. But we know nothing about any disposition of moneys under that grant. We have not the least knowledge on the subject. If the House are in truth anxious to relieve the burdens of the people, why are duties to amount to $1,000,000 a year continued in lieu of a tax that produces only half that sum?

Mr. J. Clay had only one observation to make. The gentleman, in his estimate, forgets that one of these taxes is permanent, and the other temporary.

Mr. Smilie.—It will be well enough to read the President's Message before the vote is taken, if the Clerk will read it.

A part of the President's Message was read, when the question on striking out the 3d section, which continues the additional ad valorem duties, was taken and lost—yeas 21, nays 104, as follows:

Mr. N. Williams moved to strike out the first section of the bill; but being informed by the Speaker that such a motion was not in order after the House had agreed to the amendments in the section,

Mr. N. W. then moved to strike out the word "salt" in the first section,

Mr. J. Clay called for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. N. Williams observed, that the gentleman had only anticipated a motion which he intended to make. He wished an opportunity to record his disapprobation of the measure.

He had no objection to taking off this particular duty, if any were to be repealed. He could not, however, agree to any measure at the present time, that should produce a reduction of the revenues of the Government. Considering the difficulties, internal and external, in which the country seemed to be involved, and not knowing what might be the result, he thought the resolution, at least, premature.

The question on striking out the word "salt," in the first section, was taken and lost—yeas 12, nays 109, as follows:

TUESDAY, January 13.

Mr. LEWIS, from the committee appointed on the twelfth instant, presented a bill to incorporate the Protestant Episcopal Church of the town of Alexandria; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

DUTIES ON SALT.

The bill repealing the acts imposing duties on salt and for continuing the Mediterranean fund was read the third time.

Mr. QUINCY moved to recommit the bill for the purpose of striking out "the first of July," and inserting "the first of October," so as to make the duty cease at that period.

He said, before the House went into Committee of the Whole, yesterday, on this bill, he had urged a postponement, upon the ground that the subject was too important to be pressed on, with so much expedition; that the time for consideration, usual on great questions, had not been granted, and that he was daily in expectation of some memorials, or information, from those interested in the salt manufacture, which would throw light either upon the general principle, or the details of the bill. He regretted he was not successful, as he had no doubt that, by this uncommon haste, the House would be deprived of the knowledge of facts important to a correct judgment; that he had just received information which had satisfied his mind that the time of repeal ought not to commence until the first of October. The course of the salt business, in relation to the fisheries, was this: The fishing season commenced on the last of February, and extended to the last of November. Salt was taken by the fishermen in the months of March, April, May, and June; sometimes as late as July. In order to entitle the fishermen to the bounty, their vessels must have been four months engaged in the fishery during the fishing season. Persons engaged in the business of supplying the fishermen with salt are necessitated to lay up great stores in the preceding Autumn. As these persons have paid the duty to the Government, and as no allowance of drawback is contemplated, we are certainly under obligations to take care that our law be so modelled that they shall have all the benefit of the ensuing fishing season, to get off their old stock prior to the reduction in price, which will ensue from the repeal. Now this will not be the case, if it take effect on the first of July. For an inducement is here held out to the fishermen to postpone their fishing voyage until after that period; whereby they will get the salt without paying the duty, and yet have time enough to perform their voyage, and entitle themselves to the bounty. Now this is unjust to the merchant, who ought to be secured his market for the salt on which he has paid duties. It is also unequal to the fishermen. For those who take in their salt after the first of July, and get it without duties, and yet detain the bounty, can undersell those who have paid the duties to Government by taking the salt prior to that period. He thought the reasonableness of the proposal was so plain, that he trusted there would arise no opposition to the recommitment for this purpose.

Mr. VARNUM.—There is one argument further on this subject, which has been omitted by my colleague, who made the motion to recommit the bill; but it is an argument on the other side. He proposes to continue the duties till the first of October. But it will be necessary for families in the country to lay in their salt for the season, before that period, so that, if the postponement takes place, they will derive no benefit from the repeal until the year following. I, therefore, hope that the motion to recommit the bill will not prevail.

Mr. QUINCY said, that he had named the first of October, because it was a Treasury division of the year; and because it had been stated to him, by those interested in the salt business, that it was the only time which would completely preserve them from loss on the duties. If, however, when in Committee, the House, from other considerations, should deem an earlier day expedient, he should acquiesce in the first of September, or even of August. But nothing could be more obvious than that if the fishermen had the whole month of July to take their salt, they might get the bounty without paying the duty, and the merchant who had paid the duty would not be secured the whole market of the next fishing season. He trusted, therefore, that the House would at least see the necessity of striking out the first of July, whatever future date might be inserted, and so would consent to recommit.

The question on recommitting the bill was taken, and lost—ayes 29.

The question then recurred on passing the bill.

Mr. QUINCY.—I see the current sets too strong in favor of a repeal, to be either resisted or varied, and had I only to consult my own feelings, I would content myself with giving a silent vote upon the final question. But the hopes of a numerous class of men are at stake—citizens, who have been induced, from the general policy of your laws, to vest their whole property in an important manufacture, are about to be ruined by an incalculable alteration in your system. They shall, at least, have the satisfaction of knowing that their interests were not without an advocate on this floor, however certain I may be that all efforts of mine, in the present disposition of the House, must be fruitless. As I shall put my negative on this bill, I shall use the common liberty, and assign my reasons for the vote I shall give. It is not my intention to enter into an examination of the peculiar fitness of this object, as a source of revenue; although much might be said on that point, I shall say nothing upon the general policy of releasing revenues at the present moment. The President has recommended it. That recommendation shall be as conclusive with me, as it seems to be with this House. I grant, so far as it respects the present argument, that our situation, both internal and external, is so unembarrassed, and so free from just cause of apprehension, that there is no present object on which to employ revenue, and none in prospect for which it can imaginably be necessary. I agree that all our differences with Great Britain are settled; that Spain is most amicably disposed; that France is only watchful how to promote our happiness; that there is nothing threatening on the public seaboard, nor on our frontier. I perfectly admit that our arsenals are full, our fortifications complete, that in naval and military preparation nothing more is to be wished. Whatever opinion I may hold as to any of these points, I know how utterly ineffectual any argument, founded on that opinion, would be upon this floor. I shall, therefore, confine myself wholly to such topics, as, I think, may possibly be influential, even on a body predetermined as I know this to be. My object shall be, to show the impolicy of a total abolition of the salt tax; and the policy, supposing we can do without any part of our revenue, of a partial abolition of this tax, and of affording, for the residue of the amount we can remit, relief upon other articles. And, for this purpose, I shall urge two general considerations; the importance of the salt manufacture, in a national point of view; the inequality and partiality of the distribution of relief among the people, by a total abolition of this duty, without reduction of any other.

The nature of this manufacture, its extent and importance, not only to the part of the country which carries it on, but in a national point of view, is not, I think, understood by this House. To the part of the country engaged in this business, its support is, indeed, an object of primary importance. In Barnstable county, and on Cape Cod, the manufacture is now principally followed. Many portions of this part of the country are condemned to eternal sterility and sand heaps. It happens that these, which are good for nothing else, are best suited to support the vats used in the manufacture; frosts, which, in better soils, would heave the buildings, do no damage in this. The individuals engaged in the manufacture, are, for the most part poor, and, in many instances, have invested their whole property in it; encouraged by the state of your laws, and believing they might calculate with certainty upon the continuance of the tax, at least to the amount of twelve cents, not only because salt is, in all countries, considered as one of the most eligible sources of revenue, but because, in this, it is, to that amount, a permanent tax, specifically pledged for the payment of the public debt. Whether the grounds of their calculation were not reasonable, and whether, on this account, no obligation results to this Legislature, the House will consider.

As to the extent of the manufacture, I am not possessed of all the information I expected, or should have had, if this bill had been permitted to pass through this House at the ordinary speed. But I am authorized to state that there are on Cape Cod more than three million of superficial feet of works; and that the capital invested in the manufacture exceeds four hundred thousand dollars, and that the quantity made the last year does not fall short of one hundred and fifty thousand bushels. I ask, is not this a state of manufacture worthy of the consideration of the Legislature, prior to voting its utter destruction? If, in the course of a very few years, scarcely more than four or five, this manufacture has arisen from absolute insignificance to so flourishing a state of prosperity, what would not be the result if it could rely upon a continuance of the existing encouragement for a number of years? It is not too much to say, that, in the course of ten or fifteen years, it would materially affect our imports, and in less than thirty render this country wholly independent of Europe for this important article. This is not a local concern. The manufacture is progressing southward. It already makes a capital object of attention on Long Island. And the time would not be long before the Southern States would commence the business. Their shores are equally suited to it and their climate more favorable.

But what is the importance of the manufacture in a national point of view? I answer, in the words of the President's Message, at the opening of this session: "Salt, a necessary of life, the free use of which is otherwise so important." Now, I ask, which is the readiest means to "the free use" of any article? To make it ourselves, or to be dependent for it on others? The strongest argument in the world, in favor of patronising this manufacture, is the very one used by the President, in effect, for its destruction. It is, because it is a necessary of life—because its free use is so important that we ought to encourage the only means by which that free use can be secured to us, independent of all foreign control.

I ask, what would be the effect of war upon the price of this article? It is stated to me, that, during the American war, the price varied from two dollars and a half to nine dollars, specie, the bushel, on the seaboard; making an average of six dollars. As I have this statement only from one individual, and there may be some error, I shall not rely upon it. I will only state the average war price at three dollars the bushel. This, I confidently assert, is far below the experience of the American war. The average peace price of the article, I will state, far above the fact, at one dollar the bushel. The war price of this article will operate, then, as a tax of two dollars the bushel. Our future consumption can never be less than three millions of bushels. It follows that the tax upon this people, for a single year of war, on this article, cannot be less than six millions of dollars. The amount of tax proposed to be relieved by a total abolition of the salt duty is somewhat more than half a million—say, six hundred thousand dollars, annually. The tax of a single year of war, upon this article of salt, will, therefore, exceed eleven or twelve years of your peace savings by a total abolition. Now, is a manufacture like this altogether an object so trifling as not to enter into national calculations? Ought it to be sacrificed to any scheme of popular celebrity? If it is to be crushed, ought we not to have the most plenary evidence, that it is alone by this sacrifice that the people can obtain the most desirable and imperious species of relief? This brings me to my second object, which was, to show that a total abolition of the salt tax, in its distribution of relief among the people, was partial, and did not, in any due proportion, lighten the burdens of those classes in poverty, which ought always to be the first object of the national charity.

I ask, which of all the classes of society ought we first to relieve? Certainly the poor—the laboring classes—those who have no capital but the sweat of their brows? As property ought to be the first object to be taxed, so it ought to be the last to be relieved. When this subject was yesterday in the committee, I proposed as a substitute for a total abolition of the salt tax a partial abolition of that duty and an extension of relief to the inferior species of teas, to brown sugar and coffee. The proposition was made, as I then stated, on the spur of the occasion, to break the dead silence which reigned over the passage of the bill; to bring, if I may so express myself, the intelligence of this House, out of its concealed recesses into fusion upon this floor; that it might be seen of what metal it was composed. At that time it was treated as a project of popularity. I know too well the nature of man, not to be quite certain, that it will not be popular, though I am equally well convinced that it ought to be popular, not only in this nation, but in this House. Men are much more captivated, in general, by brilliant than by useful projects. The repeal of a whole tax, and the salt tax, too, is well calculated for a great popular effect. It will bring in an abundant harvest of reputation to its author, even among those to whom the relief will be very little—comparatively nothing; and that because they will not take the trouble to understand how it affects the whole nation. The laboring classes of the community receive but a very small portion of relief from a total abolition of the salt tax. The great benefit, comparatively the whole, results to the property of the country. I ask, who pays the tax? There can be no question—the consumer. Then, where is the consumption? By ascertaining that, we shall see where the weight of the salt tax falls, and whose burdens a total abolition of it will relieve.

The salt tax may be viewed in two points of view. As a capitation tax, and as a tax upon property. In the former shape alone, it affects the poor and laboring classes. In both, it affects the rich.

Considered as a capitation tax, it cannot possibly be more than ten cents an individual. For there are three millions of bushels consumed in the country, and our present white population is six millions, which is a consumption of half a bushel a head, which, at the present rate of tax, twenty cents per bushel, is ten cents tax on each individual. But the truth is, as a capitation tax, it is far less than this, as will be obvious from a single consideration. For, besides the white population of six millions, we have an additional population of one million of slaves, and, also, certainly, not less than one million of cattle, each of which consumes, it is agreed on all hands, as much also as half a bushel per head, annually. That is to say: we have one million of salt-eating cattle, and one million of salt-eating slaves, who consume, at half a bushel per head, one million of the three millions of bushels of salt which are consumed in the country. So that there remains only two millions of bushels to be averaged upon the white population of six millions. That is to say, the consumption of the white people cannot exceed one-third of a bushel of salt per head. This, at twenty cents tax, is a little above six cents upon each individual. So that a total abolition of the salt tax is, as it respects the poor and laboring classes, a reduction of six cents annual tax from the individual. Gentlemen from the interior, (whose constituents are interested in getting rid of this whole tax, because this they feel, while they feel, comparatively, no other,) may talk about the poor, as if they eat more than the rich, from their consuming more salt meat. But, a little consideration will show it is not true, or, if true, not in a degree to materially affect the argument. For, in whatever form the salt be eaten, no more than an average of one-third of a bushel per head, can be annually consumed in the country, for no more than that is there in the country to consume. Now, salt is an article of which all must eat a little, and no man can eat a great deal. And although in salt meats the poor may eat more than the rich, yet in a multitude of luxuries, in the waste and consumption of their servants and dependants, the balance of expenditure must inevitably be on the side of the rich. The truth probably is, that the expenditure of the laboring classes and poor, is much less than a third of a bushel per head. As a capitation tax it cannot be more than six cents Now, let us see the real result of this captivating proposition of total abolition of the salt tax.

A poor man with seven in his family, the common average, is to be relieved from six cents per head—that is, from forty-two cents annual tax. On the other hand, a rich farmer or planter, with the same number of whites in his family, and a hundred head of cattle or slaves, pays, as well as the poorer man, a capitation tax of forty two cents. But he also pays, in the consumption of his cattle or slaves, ten cents per head. That is—ten dollars annually. So that, truly considered, this is a scheme to relieve such a laborer's family of an annual tax of forty-two cents, and, at the same time, to relieve such a rich farmer or planter of an annual tax of nearly ten dollars and a half. Now, I contend, that such farmers and such planters are not the first objects of national relief. As far as the salt tax is a capitation tax, it is a very light one. As far as it is a property tax it is a very equal one. While the rich farmer or planter with a hundred head of cattle or slaves pays ten dollars, the poor farmer, with a single cow, pays but ten cents. In its operation upon this class, every farmer or planter pays according to the stock he keeps. In other words, according to his riches. Now, is not this a scale by which all taxes should be graduated? The proportion in which the relief is to be shared in particular quarters of the country, and by particular classes, is out of all reason. Gentlemen say this is a rare case—we shall scarcely see the like again. I say, then, give us a just share of it on the seaboard, while it is going; and, what is still, in a national view, a greater object—thereby also save the salt manufacture.

The plan which I proposed yesterday would have both these effects. Gentlemen say this is a popular string. I abjure touching it for that purpose. It is the established principle of all wise finance. Let taxes bear last upon the poor and laboring classes; let them first be relieved. But here is a scheme to give a world of relief to the property of the country, and little, comparatively nothing, to the laboring classes; and that little altogether incidental. By reducing eight cents only upon salt, half a cent per pound upon brown sugar, six cents upon the inferior classes of teas, and one cent upon coffee, the same amount of relief would be extended to the community, only it would be differently distributed. Such a laborer's family, as I have mentioned, supposing that it consumed only twelve pounds of tea, twelve pounds of coffee, one hundred pounds of brown sugar, and three bushels of salt annually, would be relieved of somewhere about one dollar and sixty cents annual tax, instead of forty cents, as by the present scheme. On the other hand, such a planter's family, with his hundred slaves or cattle, will still be relieved from above five dollars and a half annual tax. And it seems to me that gentlemen from the interior ought to be content with such an abatement, particularly as, by not claiming such an exorbitant proportion of the relief contemplated, they save the salt manufacture to the country.

A total abolition is not only unequal as it respects the classes, it is also as it respects the natural sections of the country. It is agreed on all hands, the interior, the South and the West, consume more salt; and it cannot be denied that the inhabitants of the seaboard consume more of the articles I have mentioned, as well as of other imported articles, than the inhabitants of the other parts of the country. They must necessarily, not only from their populousness, but from their habits and necessities. Now, if the former bear hard upon you, the latter bears hard upon us. If, in the original establishment of the system of taxes, articles were chosen and the amount of tax arranged so as to make the whole mass of taxation fall equally upon every part of the country; if in relieving taxes you take off altogether the tax upon one article, the consumption of which is, beyond comparison, the greatest in one quarter, and relieve nothing from those the consumption of which is greatest in another; what is this but destroying the whole equilibrium of the system?

The character of this policy is still more strikingly elucidated by considering it in relation to another part of the act. This is not only an act for the abolition of the salt tax, it is also an act for the continuance of the Mediterranean fund. It might easily be shown that the consumption of the articles on which this fund arises, is beyond proportion greater along the seaboard and in the cities than in the interior. When that act was passed, had any individual alleged upon this floor, that, under this act, it was intended, by the prevailing influence, to throw off the salt tax, which was the chief burden on particular sections, a suggestion of that kind would have been treated as an insult, and we should have been pointed to a specific pledge contained in that act, which provides that the Mediterranean fund should cease within six months after the war in that sea had ceased. But what is the fact? The war has ceased—the fund is continued. It gives nearly a million of dollars. The salt tax is little more than half a million. The former is kept alive, and is made the efficient reason for the repeal of the latter. In truth, this act, instead of being denominated "An act repealing the duty on salt and continuing in force the Mediterranean fund," ought to be entitled "An act repealing the only tax which obliges the South, the West, and the interior, to bear a just proportion of the public burdens, and for the continuance of all existing, and the further imposition of a new tax, chiefly paid by the seaboard and the cities."

With such a title, it ought to be sent out, in company with other acts, such as were passed the last, and will probably be passed this session, entitled "Acts of appropriation for the fortification and defence of the ports and harbors of the United States." This is a twin policy with that. They have both the same parentage, and there is between them a perfect family resemblance. There is as much real protection to those parts of the country which deserve protection in the one, as there is real relief to those classes of the people, which deserve first to have the benefit of relief, in the other.

Mr. VARNUM.—I shall not attempt to follow my colleague (Mr. QUINCY) through all the arguments he has advanced on the bill. I shall notice a single observation that has fallen from him, concerning the local operation of the repeal. It has been often asserted in this House, at former periods, that certain measures operated locally, and were intended to benefit one part of the Union at the expense of another. I recollect this was the fact in regard to the tax on carriages. It was contended then that the repeal of the tax was calculated in particular to relieve the Southern States, whereas Massachusetts paid her full proportion of that tax. So now again there is an attempt to impress the belief that the repeal of the duties on salt is calculated to favor the South and the West, to the prejudice of the East. Sir, there is as much salt consumed in the Eastern, as in the Southern and Western States. In New Hampshire, except a small district on the seashore, which is inconsiderable, the consumption is great. Such is the fact throughout Vermont, and also throughout Massachusetts, excepting only a narrow tract on the seashore. The Eastern States are, therefore, as much interested in the repeal of those duties as any part of the Union.

Mr. BIDWELL.—The principal arguments urged by my colleague against the bill under consideration, appear to be two. 1st. That it will ruin the manufacturers. 2dly. That the benefit of the measure will be unequal. But, shall the interest of a few manufacturers, a few hundreds only, or a few thousand if you please, be put in competition with the general interests of the country? As to the second objection, that the benefits of the measure will not be enjoyed equally, the gentleman states that one man will be relieved from a tax of only forty-two cents, and another will be relieved from the burden of ten dollars. This is the very reason why the duties ought to be repealed. If they fall so unequally, they ought at once to be done away. The gentleman, in the abundant resources of his ingenuity, could not have invented a stronger argument for the repeal, since, by his own acknowledgment, the duties are now so unequal that one man is compelled to pay ten dollars, and another pays only forty-two cents.

As to the objection that this measure is designed to favor the South, I would observe that the Eastern States, with the exception of only a very few inhabitants on the seacoast, are as deeply interested in the repeal as any quarter of the Union.

Mr. HOLLAND.—The first argument urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) who spoke against the bill, is, that the repeal of the duty will destroy the manufactures of salt. But, supposing such to be the fact, who is to blame? Those only who have been such forward speculators in this manufacture. They have had ample notice, for it has been well understood for several years that Government designed to relinquish these duties as soon as they could be dispensed with. This is the first time I ever heard that salt was not used by the poor. I had always thought that the rich and poor used about the same quantity, and that a tax on this article approached very near a capitation tax. The poor have cattle also to eat salt. The tax is felt more by the poor than by the rich. The manufacturing of salt is not confined to Massachusetts. The business is carried on in Virginia, where immense sums have been imprudently laid out in that way, and several adventurers ruined by the result. I apprehend no danger to the public from checking such extravagant manufactures.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL.—I rise only to observe that the people of the Western States, at least of Tennessee, have no particular interest in passing this law. More salt is manufactured than is consumed there, so that some of the inhabitants on the east of the mountains are supplied from those manufactories.

Mr. BROOM.—I cannot reconcile it to myself to give a silent vote upon the final passage of this bill, because it contains two distinct propositions widely different from each other, and which are by no means equally acceptable to me. The one to abolish the specific duty on salt, the other to impose additional duties ad valorem. To the first I cordially assent, to the latter I have serious objections. I am happy that I had an opportunity, whilst this bill was passing through its several stages, to record my vote separately for the abolition of the salt duty and against the continuation of the additional duties. The question now is, Shall this bill pass? And we are now to consider whether it will be productive of more good than injury. I could have wished that these two provisions had been made the subjects of separate bills in order that the sense of the House and of the nation might be distinctly ascertained upon each, without the influence of one upon the other; but a different course has been pursued, and the House is now called on to decide whether they will abolish the duty on salt, although coupled with the encumbrance of the Mediterranean fund, or reject the bill altogether. It has been well calculated, that thus situated, our earnest zeal to remove the salt tax will make us less sensible of the imposition of the additional duties, and that our regard to personal popularity may make us yield to a tax of which the great mass of the people is not sensible, rather than hazard an opposition to the removal of one which the whole community knows and feels. By this political contrivance the additional tax is so well seasoned to the taste of the people, that it is presumed they cannot fail to relish it. I wish to be understood that I am in favor of the repeal of the duty on salt, and I congratulate the House upon the unexpected change in their opinion on the subject since the last session. We have been repeatedly pressed to abolish this duty, but an imposing majority has hitherto prevented it. I am happy that the propriety of the measure has been discovered even at this late day, and I shall not inquire whether this change has been produced by a sense of this propriety, by the President's recommendation, by the desire of conforming to the popular wish, or by a dread of popular indignation. I wish it also to be understood that I am opposed to the imposition of the additional duties; and, as it is a duty which I owe to myself, I trust the House will indulge me while I explain the reasons of my opposition, and account for the vote which I shall this day give. I am not against granting money in case money is wanted—far be it from me even to wish to paralyze the arm of Government, or to embarrass its operations. If gentlemen will condescend to demonstrate the necessity of this tax, with all my heart I will vote for it, and hazard its due application to the purposes for which it is asked. But when not even a glimmering of light is given us, and we are obliged to grope our way into darkness, we must each trust to the light of our own understandings. We ought to know before we lay taxes the necessity of laying them. It is sporting with the resources of the nation to call by new taxes for money when there is more already in the Treasury than we will use. In searching for the reason of this tax we are naturally led to consider in the first place the expenditures of Government and resources to meet them.

By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, at this session, we find that he estimates the expenditures of Government for 1807 (including the extraordinary appropriation of two millions made at the last session) at $14,100,000.

To meet this expenditure we have of permanent revenue, exclusive of Mediterranean fund and salt duty,	$13,000,000,
And a balance in Treasury, January 1, 1807, - - - - -	4,000,000,
Making in the whole - - -	$17,000,000
And leaving a balance in the Treasury at the end of this year of nearly	$3,000,000
For the year 1808, according to the Secretary's plan for redeeming the public debt, there will be wanted for the public debt, - - - - -	8,756,000
For all other expenses of Government, including $400,000 for contingencies, - - - - - -	3,900,000
	$12,656,000
To meet this expenditure we have of permanent revenue, exclusive of Mediterranean fund and salt duty, at least - - - - - -	13,000,000
Balance in Treasury January 1, 1808,	3,000,000
Making in the whole - - -	$16,000,000

The Mediterranean fund cannot, therefore, be wanted for any purpose in contemplation during the years 1807 and 1808. For the average revenue from 1809 to 1815 inclusive, the Secretary calculates on $14,000,000, exclusive of the Mediterranean fund, and without calculating the revenue from New Orleans. Supposing then this last mentioned revenue to supply the deficiency occasioned by the repeal of the salt duty, the revenue may still be calculated at $14,000,000 from 1809 to 1815.

As the laws now are, all the expenditures of Government during these years, including the provision for the public debt, will be $8,500,000, leaving an annual surplus of 5½ millions; but if the proposed plan of the Committee of Ways and Means for the payment of the public debt, should be sanctioned by law, and assented to by the creditors, there will then be wanted for the expenditures of Government, nearly $12,000,000, leaving in this last case an annual surplus of $2,000,000.

The calculations of the permanent revenue are made by the Secretary on the lowest possible scale; for they are made on the basis of the revenue received during a year of European peace, with a proper allowance for our increase in population and wealth, and without including many incidental branches of revenue. If then, this tax is not wanted to support Government, or to provide for any contemplated scheme for the redemption of the debt, or for any other designated object, why should we grant it? There is one reason given, for which I must give credit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE.) He called for the reading of it yesterday, and seemed to consider it, without any comment, as a conclusive argument. It was the President's Message recommending the measure. I could scarcely have expected from the majority of this House, so nearly approximated as they are to the people, so little jealousy of Executive influence, and such avowed submission to Presidential recommendation. The message was read—it was too plain to be misunderstood, and of itself argument sufficient, and the House was prepared to lay the additional duty. This is certainly an easy mode of managing the business of legislation, but by no means the most honorable to ourselves, or useful to our constituents; we are not sent here merely as the instruments of taxation, but as men invested with discretion to measure out the burdens of the community and to administer to the wants of the Government, according to our own views of the right of the latter, and the necessity of the case. The recommendation of the President may possibly proceed from the best and most patriotic motives; but yet he may err. The soundest policy may justify the tax which he recommends, and it may be our duty to impose it; but of this we ought to be convinced before we sanction it. Now, let me ask, what reason is given to justify this call for money? Are we not told that our Treasury is full and flowing over, and that the Constitution must be amended to enlarge the federal trust and give us an opportunity of getting rid of it? Why, then, this great anxiety for more money? Do we not know the danger of too much? Have we not been told by high authority that too much money may lead to war? Why then do we wish to run with our eyes open headlong into temptation, and involve ourselves in that hurtful practice of injuring one another? Why accumulate that evil which may obstruct the progress of brotherly love and universal philanthropy?

I beg the House to reflect that the question is not now whether we shall take off a tax of one million of dollars, but simply whether we shall lay on that tax. The tax ceases by its own terms with the cause which produced it, and if no law is passed to impose this tax again, the 4th of March will find the people relieved from its burden, and the law itself consigned to its rank among the musty rolls of expired laws. When this tax was laid, the people submitted to it without a murmur. It was a voluntary contribution; and I might almost say that humanity, charity, and patriotism, were the donors. The feelings of the nation were roused for the protection of our commerce and seamen against the pirates of Barbary, and in the moment of generous national excitement this additional duty was laid—not as a matter of revenue, but for the sole avowed purpose of protecting our seamen and commerce, and for carrying on warlike operations against the hostile Barbary Powers. And so particular were the provisions of the law, that a separate account was to be kept, that the people might see whether it was faithfully applied to the purpose for which they generously intended it. By the same law the faith of the nation was pledged that the duty should cease three months after a treaty with Tripoli, unless the United States should be at war with some other Power. Now mark the sequel. The war was ended, a treaty with Tripoli concluded, and this productive duty was to cease for ever.

The money was too convenient to be so easily parted with. But what was to be done? All were desponding, when, on a sudden, a speck of war was discerned in the horizon of Barbary. The intelligence was communicated to Congress and the tax was to live yet a year longer. The moment of dissolution is now approaching, but the money is as convenient as ever and the tax must still live; and now the policy is to keep this additional duty, which produces a million of dollars, and amuse the people with the release of the salt tax, which produces but half the money. It is not now even pretended that any wars or rumors of wars exist between us and any of the Barbary Powers, and we are not told that the money is wanted for any other definite purpose; we are only told by the President that the tax ought to be continued, and in order to make it more popular, he tells us that it is levied chiefly on luxuries. Notwithstanding this high authority I cannot help suspecting that upon examination this tax will be found to bear chiefly on articles which the habits and manners of civilized nations have made necessary to their comfort. There are three rates of ad valorem duties; the lowest is applied to the most necessary articles, such as wood and iron work, and linen, woollen, and cotton goods.

The highest rate is applied to articles the least necessary, and of which it is the policy of Government to restrain the importation.

The value of articles of the lower rate, by the report laid on our table this morning, is $37,000,000.

The value of articles of all other rates is something more than $7,000,000.

The first class produces a revenue, exclusive of the Mediterranean fund, of $4,188,000.

The other classes produce a revenue of but $1,168,000.

The inference then is, that this additional duty, ad valorem, bears chiefly not on luxuries, but on necessaries.

I cannot help thinking, therefore, that this tax is not laid with a view to restrain luxury, but because it is convenient and productive, and has been at a fortunate moment ingrafted on our collection laws without complaint. If this tax is wanted to put the country in a state of defence, by fortifications or military or naval preparations, let gentlemen tell us so, and considering the fund pledged for that purpose I will freely vote for it. If it is wanted for any other purpose, let us know the purpose and alter the title of the bill to correspond with it. But why should we resort to this assumed name, and raise the money to protect our seamen and commerce against the Barbary Powers, when we know in our hearts that not a dollar of it will be applied to that purpose? Are we afraid the people should know our object? These, Mr. Speaker, are my reasons for objecting to so much of the bill as continues the additional duties. The question now is, whether the bill will do more good than injury; and considering that the relief of the salt duty is permanent, while the additional duties are but temporary, I am reconciled to vote for the bill, having first protested against its objectionable parts, that I may not in future be pledged to vote for the further imposition of the national duties.

Mr. DANA.—I concur with my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) in the opinion, that a reduction of the duty on salt would be more proper than a total repeal. According to my apprehension of the subject, a moderate duty on salt ought not to be considered as generally oppressive, although it may be thought burdensome in certain parts of the country. Considering the present state of our revenues, I would reduce the duty on salt; for I think the sum of twenty cents per bushel to be more than the average rate of duty on the great mass of imports. Various articles, indeed, are subjected to much heavier duties; but they are such as have less claim to relief. In a financial view of the subject, a reduction of the duty on salt appears preferable to a repeal, as it would be favorable to an equalisation of impost. The residuary portion on salt would authorize a reduction of duties on other articles which are in general use, and still are charged with impost above the average rate. This reduction of duties on various classes of articles, which are consumed by the laboring portion of the community, would operate to extend more equally the relief from taxation. But the popular attention has been so strongly attracted towards a repeal of the duty on salt, this has been rendered so much the theme of popular regard, that I have no expectation that any efforts would now persuade the House to decide in favor of such an equalisation of imposts as appears to be proper, whether we regard the principles of finance or the relief of the people. Under existing circumstances, a total repeal of the salt duty, or no relief from taxation, is the alternative, on which our votes are required. In this view of the subject, my opinion is decided to vote for the repeal.

Yet, why must a repeal of the salt duty be connected with the imposition of additional duties on other articles? According to the Secretary of the Treasury's report on the finances, of the 5th of December, 1806, the proceeds of the additional duties, called "the Mediterranean fund," amounted to more than a million of dollars for one year. The product of the impost on salt, for the same year, was less than six hundred thousand dollars.—(See note A.)

The bill before the House contains one section for repealing the salt duty, and another section for continuing the Mediterranean fund. In other words, it proposes to relieve the people from a specific duty, amounting to about half a million of dollars, and to lay upon them duties, ad valorem, to the amount of about a million.

No reasons are given, officially, which appear to me sufficient for requiring these additional duties. As one of the Representatives of the people, I cannot consider it my incumbent duty submissively to acknowledge the irresistible force of Executive argumentation.

In the month of March, 1804, after the loss of the Philadelphia frigate, on the coast of Tripoli, an act was passed under the title of "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers. By the first section of this act, all imports subject to duties, ad valorem, were charged with the additional duties of two and a half per centum. These new duties were imposed expressly for the purpose of defraying the expenses of naval armaments and warlike operations against Tripoli, or any other Power of Barbary which should make war against the United States, and for the purpose of defraying other expenses which might be incident to the intercourse with the Barbary Powers. The second section required a distinct account to be kept of these additional duties, the proceeds of which were to be denominated "the Mediterranean fund," and to be applied solely to the purposes designated by the act. The same section contained a limitation, by which the whole of this additional impost was to cease at the expiration of three months after the conclusion of peace with Tripoli, unless the United States should then be at war with any other of the Barbary Powers.

During the last session of Congress, a Treaty of Peace with Tripoli was ratified, and no other Barbary Power was at war with the United States. Of course, all the additional duties were soon to cease, by the terms of the act which imposed them. But, it may be recollected, during the same session, there was, in this country, a Turk, called the Tunisian Minister. He, it seems, for some cause, thought proper to say something about a present for the Bey of Tunis, and about a war in case of refusal. On the 14th of April, 1806, the President of the United States made a communication to Congress, relative to the affair, and relative to the Mediterranean fund. The Message of the President was in these terms:

"During the blockade of Tripoli, by the squadron of the United States, a small cruiser, under the flag of Tunis, with two prizes, all of trifling value, attempted to enter Tripoli, was turned back, warned, and attempting again to enter, was taken and detained as prize by the squadron. Her restitution was claimed by the Bey of Tunis, with a threat of war, in terms so serious that, on withdrawing from the blockade of Tripoli, the commanding officer of the squadron thought it his duty to repair to Tunis with his squadron, and to require a categorical declaration, whether peace or war was intended. The Bey preferred explaining himself by an Ambassador to the United States, who, on his arrival, renewed the request, that the vessel and her prizes should be restored. It was deemed proper to give this proof of friendship to the Bey, and the Ambassador was informed the vessel would be restored."

"Afterwards he made a requisition of naval stores to be sent to the Bey, in order to secure a peace for the term of three years, with a threat of war if refused. It has been refused; and the Ambassador is about to depart, without receding from his threat or demand."

"Under these circumstances, and considering that the several provisions of the act of March twenty-fifth, one thousand eight hundred and four, will cease, in consequence of the ratification of the Treaty of Peace with Tripoli, now advised and consented to by the Senate, I have thought it my duty to communicate these facts, in order that Congress may consider the expediency of continuing the same provisions for a limited time, or making others equivalent."

After Congress had received this Message, the first section of the act, that which imposed the additional duties ad valorem, was continued in force. The chief effect of the threat mentioned in the Message seems to have been the addition of about a million of dollars to the revenue. As to anything further, the threat was so little regarded, that you did not vote seamen enough to enable the Secretary of the Navy to send a relieving squadron to the Mediterranean.

By the terms of the act continuing the additional duties, they are to cease at the close of the present session of Congress. And again, we are called upon to continue them until the end of another session. Yet, there is no war nor menace of war with any of the piratical States of Barbary. What other reasons are now assigned for continuing the additional duties? And, if they are still to be levied, why is this to be done under the name of "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers?" They are no longer appropriated for the purposes of such protection.

The official reasons for continuing these duties, are to be found in the communications of the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States. On the 18th of December, 1806, the Secretary of the Treasury addressed a letter on this subject to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. In that letter, I find these observations:

"If no other expenses whatever shall be incurred, but such as are already actually authorized by law, neither the salt tax nor the Mediterranean fund are any longer wanted. The propriety of continuing the last-mentioned fund for a limited time might be decided by considerations connected with the political situation of the United States. For it is only to provide for the speedy payment of any contemplated acquisition of territory, without creating a new debt, or in case of war, that the fund can be wanted. Under existing circumstances, I should think it consistent with prudence to continue it for one year longer."

Here it is proper to correct an error in the observations which I had the honor of submitting to the House yesterday. On a hasty perusal of the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, I had supposed that these additional duties might be wanted as a fund towards discharging the extraordinary two millions of dollars, appropriated in conclave during the last session of Congress. This opinion was erroneous; and I owe it to the Secretary of the Treasury to correct the error. In a more attentive examination of his letter, it appears that this additional revenue is not wanted as a fund towards defraying any expense already actually authorized by law. The expenditure of the two millions was actually authorized by a law of the last session. And it appears, from the Secretary's report on the finances, that provision is already made for satisfying the whole of this extraordinary charge on the Treasury. So that the additional impost is not wanted at all, on account of extraordinary foreign intercourse, unless, indeed, there should be a demand for, perhaps, a million of dollars, in ready money, to be added to the two millions voted at the last session. As I did not assent to that vote, it is not to be expected that I should consider such a reason as sufficient for the levying of additional duties.

In the Message of the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, there is another official reason. Permit me, sir, to read that part of the Message to which I refer:

"The duties composing the Mediterranean fund will cease, by law, at the end of the present session. Considering, however, that they are levied chiefly on luxuries, and that we have an impost on salt, a necessary of life, the free use of which is otherwise so important, I recommend to your consideration the suppression of the duties on salt, and the continuation of the Mediterranean fund, instead thereof, for a short time, after which that also will become unnecessary for any purpose now within contemplation."

The reason here assigned, is, that of a sumptuary law for taxing luxuries. Although some of the articles paying duties ad valorem may, perhaps, be deemed such, it seems to be at least questionable, whether they ought generally to be denominated luxuries, unless we are to understand the term in a sense materially different from the usual acceptation.

In the month of December, 1801, the Secretary of the Treasury made a report to Congress, in pursuance of the act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department. With that report, he presented various statements relative to the revenues of the United States. One of them is a table of duties, on merchandise imported. By recurring to this table, we may be assisted in forming a judgment, whether the articles paying duties ad valorem are chiefly luxuries, or whether they are chiefly, not only convenient, but rendered necessary by habitual use, and by a regard to the decencies of civilized life.

The imports are arranged under three heads—articles free of duty, articles paying duties ad valorem, and articles paying specific duties. The duties ad valorem are stated at various rates—twenty per cent., fifteen per cent., and twelve and a half per cent. To all these rates of duty, there has been the addition of two and a half per cent., under the act of March, 1804. Formerly, twelve and a half per cent. was the lowest rate; but since that act went into operation, no articles paying duties ad valorem are charged with less than fifteen per cent. Accordingly, if you examine the last statement of duties and drawbacks for three successive years, as laid before the House by the Secretary of the Treasury, you will find no entry, in the year 1805, for duties received at the rate of twelve and a half per cent. ad valorem. But you will find the old twelve-and-a-half and the new two-and-a-half combined, in a duty of fifteen per cent., and amounting to about six millions of dollars. After deducting the drawback of duties for the same year, the net revenue derived from this source was five millions.—(See note B.)

If gentlemen have attentively examined the financial policy which has been pursued in this country with respect to former duties on imports, they must know it has been a general principle of the system to lay only the lowest rate of impost ad valorem upon articles of necessary use; articles consumed by the great mass of free population; articles not chiefly used by the rich, the elegant, the fashionable, or the prodigal.

The articles charged with the lowest duties ad valorem appear, from the Secretary's table of duties, to consist principally of manufactures of wool, cotton, silk, hemp, flax, and wood. They are chiefly linens, cottons, woollens of various descriptions, and comprehending the ordinary or coarse fabrics which are worn by the laboring and industrious portions of the community. These are articles of indispensable use, unless persons are to live in society like the cattle in the fields, or like the slaves in some parts of the West Indies.

The articles in question are so generally regarded as articles of first necessity, they are so much wanted by the great body of the community, the consumption is so universal, that the impost on them for a single year gives a net product of five millions of dollars. In estimated value, the articles liable to the several duties ad valorem constitute about one half of all our imports.—(See note C.)

If the object of the President's recommendation was that of a sumptuary law, if we continue the additional duties upon this principle, we must consider the articles of ordinary clothing as luxuries; we must act upon the supposition that everything is a luxury which is not absolutely essential to the support of animal existence. Some idea of this sort has been formerly advanced, I think, by Mandeville, in his "Fable of the Bees." If such was the President's meaning in speaking of the duties ad valorem, as being levied chiefly on luxuries, we are presented with an innovation in language under the form of official information. Is this to be recognised as a reason for taxing the great body of the community? Such are the official reasons for additional taxation. Do we find any reason for it in the measures adopted by Congress at the present session? As yet, no legislative act has been passed for authorizing any expenditures which can require the additional duties.

Indeed, sir, it is not a little extraordinary that we are called upon to tax the people, while we are invited to consider a project for expending future surplusses of revenue, a project for preventing accumulations of money in the Treasury. In pursuance of this recommendation, a select committee of seventeen has been appointed. It is a committee for considering measures by which the surplus revenue may be absorbed. A gentleman from Vermont (Mr. ELLIOT) has called it the Committee of Ways and Means, No. 2. The chairman of it is the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has spoken several times about the duty on salt, (Mr. BIDWELL.) As yet, we have no report from this committee of absorption; nor do I learn that a quorum has ever been assembled.

I admit the force of the observation made by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. J. CLAY,) that the proposed continuation of the additional duties is temporary, and that the impost on salt is laid without limitation of time. In a question between paying a million of dollars for one year, and an annuity of half a million in perpetuity, it is evident, the payment of a million will be the cheapest in the result. If no relief, as to the salt duty, can be had on any other terms, if we are reduced to the necessity of making this sort of bargain for the people or leaving them to pay the half million annually forever, it is clearly the best calculation to admit the tax of a million of dollars for one year.

But will not the tax be called for again? It seems to be continued with singular facility from year to year. Without adequate official reasons; without appropriations to require it; without the discussion usually had in cases of less moment; or, perhaps, some intimation; for some cause not distinctly explained; year after year; under a specious form of words, members of this House are found ready to pass a bill for levying these additional duties.

When the further continuation of additional duties is spoken of as a measure of precaution, I can understand the general force of the observation as relative to the exigencies of our situation. I admit its validity, if understood with reference to providing means of defence. In the present convulsed state of the world, while the hostilities between foreign Powers have such extensive consequences; amidst controversies which seriously affect our external relations; amidst rumors of extraordinary movements within our own borders; after all the urgent applications for a more protective system with respect to a portion of the country peculiarly situated, and of eminent importance to our commerce and revenue, where adequate provision for the defence of a single State would form a barrier for various other States; under this view of affairs abroad and at home, I would give no cause for the reproach of withholding the proper supplies. When the safety, the honor, the liberty, of my country, are concerned, I deem it my duty, as a member of this House, to vote supplies corresponding to the exigencies of the time. In such cases, if the cause requires pecuniary means, I disdain to act the niggard. However unpopular, however odious it might be for the moment to impose taxes, I ought to prefer the public interest to popular prejudice. Provision for the common defence is a momentous subject of deliberation; it is a subject on which we may have yet to act. With a view to efficacious measures of security, I can admit the propriety of voting to continue the additional duties. They will add a million to the revenue.

With these sentiments, I purpose to vote for the bill on your table; although, without the additional duties, the Treasury statements authorize us to expect a surplus of three millions, after satisfying all the estimates of expenditures for the current year. According to my view of the subject, the observations of my friend from Delaware (Mr. BROOM) have fully established this position. Indeed, he has been so far from exceeding what the Treasury documents will warrant, that, in my apprehension, he might fairly have argued that there would be a greater surplus. In support of this idea, and in addition to what he has said, it may be remarked, that the Secretary of the Treasury has taken the revenue for the current year at an estimate clearly within limits. It is not improbable that the surplus will be at least one million more than has been mentioned by my friend from Delaware. According to the Secretary's report, the revenue of the customs, after deducting the product of the additional duties, may be safely estimated at thirteen millions of dollars, a less sum than accrued during the year 1805, after making a similar deduction. And we learn from the same report, that the net revenue of the three first quarters of the year 1806, exceeds that of the corresponding quarters of the year 1805.

The probable increase of the revenue may be inferred from another consideration. In consequence of the credits allowed for duties of the customs, it is well known that the receipts of the Treasury, for any given year, depend essentially on the amount of importations during the year preceding. On examining the last Treasury statement of importations, they will be found to have considerably exceeded those of former years.

These are some of the reasons which induce me to believe, that the revenue will be increased at least a million of dollars, if not a million and a half or two millions, and perhaps to a greater amount. I am the more confirmed in this opinion, when I reflect that the receipts at the Treasury have generally, if not uniformly, exceeded the estimates of revenue presented to Congress from the Treasury Department. Such is the peculiar situation of our country and the increase of its resources, and such, of consequence, the progress of the revenue, that the actual product from year to year has been found to surmount the official calculations submitted to the Legislature. We may therefore regard it as probable that, after satisfying the ordinary estimates, the surplus of revenue for the current year, including the product of the additional duties, will exceed five millions of dollars.

With such ample means, it may be hoped that some measures will be adopted, with a view to an adequate system of defence.

The question was now taken that the said bill do pass, and was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 5, as follows:

PUNISHMENT OF CRIMES.

The House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

The amendments proposed to the first section were agreed to.

The whole of the second section was struck out.

On agreeing to the new section, proposed by Mr. BIDWELL, Mr. ELLIOT spoke at considerable length against it—when the House adjourned without deciding upon it.

WEDNESDAY, January 14.

Mr. BOYLE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed by a resolution of the House, of the ninth instant, "to inquire into the expediency of offering for sale the public lands situate between the United States' military tract and the Connecticut Reserve, to which the Indian title has been extinguished," presented a bill making provision for the disposal of the public lands situated between the United States military tract and the Connecticut Reserve, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. EARLY, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill authorizing the erection of certain light-houses and the fixing of stakes, buoys, and beacons, at certain places therein named; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending to the revenue districts on Lake Erie, and within the State of Ohio, the provisions of an act, entitled "An act to extend jurisdiction in certain cases to State Judges and State Courts;" and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

PUNISHMENT OF CERTAIN CRIMES.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

The Committee reported an additional section, introduced by Mr. BIDWELL, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person, for whose keeping of the peace and being of good behaviour, a recognisance shall hereafter be entered into, in pursuance of the laws of the United States, shall, without the limits of the United States, carry on, or aid in carrying on, or begin, or set on foot, or provide or prepare the means of a military expedition or enterprise against any foreign Prince or State at peace with the United States, such recognisance shall thereby be forfeited.

Mr. DANA opposed the section. It went to punish acts done without the jurisdiction of the United States, and within the territorial limits of foreign Powers. The section was also partial in its operation, comprehending one class of men, and excluding all others. It operates, said Mr. D., only on those who have given a recognisance to keep the peace and be of good behaviour. If it is proper to punish such acts at all, every person ought to receive the same measure of justice.

The United States are not responsible for the conduct of their citizens while under the territorial jurisdiction of foreign Powers. Every nation is responsible for the acts of those citizens who are within its own limits. Our citizens may engage in the service of foreign Powers at war, without violating our neutrality. Such has been the well known usage in Europe. This section contains a principle unprecedented, and before unheard of. I hope it will not be agreed to.

Mr. BIDWELL replied. He thought the section correct in principle, and important to be adopted. It was calculated to preserve the peace and neutrality of the United States from being endangered by the lawless acts of unprincipled citizens. Mr. B. then referred to a law, passed in 1797, to show that acts committed without the limits of the United States, had been considered as proper objects of punishment.

Mr. EARLY was decidedly hostile to the section. Among other objections, it went to destroy completely the right of expatriation.

Mr. EPPES moved to strike out the words "without the limits of the United States," and spoke at length in support of the motion. He thought that the amendment would remove the objections of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DANA,) and from Georgia, (Mr. EARLY,) and yet preserve something useful in the section.

Mr. ALSTON moved to recommit the section, with the amendment proposed by Mr. EPPES. He thought the section contained something really valuable, but it needed considerable modification.

Mr. DAWSON opposed the recommitment.

Mr. ALSTON replied.

Mr. ELLIOT doubted whether the motion was in order.

Mr. BIDWELL was in favor of recommitment.

Mr. EARLY thought the section so radically defective that no modification could remove the objections against it.

Mr. DANA spoke at length against the principle of the section, and hence inferred the impropriety of recommitting.

Mr. ALSTON replied; when the question of recommitment was taken and lost—ayes 32.

Mr. EPPES withdrew his amendment and proposed another, to strike out the "laws of the United States," and insert the words, "act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, passed on 5th June, 1794."

Mr. ELLIOT was adverse to all amendments. He hoped the section would be wholly rejected.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 16.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the section as reported by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DWIGHT.—I have no wish to detain the House at so late an hour, and after the question has been so thoroughly discussed; but, viewing the principle contained in the amendment as extremely interesting, and, if adopted, as calculated to produce great mischief, I cannot be contented with giving my vote, without stating the reasons in justification of it.

As the great point, whether it be necessary or proper for the United States to extend the influence of their laws over their citizens when out of their limits and within the jurisdiction of a foreign Government has been satisfactorily considered by my colleague, (Mr. DANA,) and a gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. EARLY,) I will only remark, generally, that, for the reasons which have been suggested, and for others which might be suggested, I doubt very much either the necessity or propriety of such a measure.

But, sir, if necessary or proper, I think the mode here proposed extremely improper. If we wish to make it criminal in our citizens to violate the peace of, or to set on foot measures of hostility against foreign nations or Governments, let us begin by declaring it criminal by a direct, explicit law, and not pursue the mode here attempted. Sir, we are legislating at the wrong end of a statute; we are fixing the punishment without previously declaring the crime. What objection can there possibly be to proceeding in the common mode, first declaring the offence and then prescribing the punishment? But the honorable mover of this amendment, in answer to an objection raised by my colleague, (Mr. DANA,) says, that this is no innovation in legislation; that this is the common mode; that this section renders the acts mentioned in it illegal, and that it is usual to define the offence, and prescribe the punishment, in the same section. My colleague, sir, did not, and certainly I shall not object to this section, because it contains both the crime and the punishment. Our objection is, that it contains no offence, it defines no crime. Is there any expression in this amendment, which declares anything to be criminal? If there be, the honorable gentleman can certainly point me to it. I find nothing like it. On the contrary, we are only told, "that if any person who has become bound to 'keep the peace and be of good behaviour, in pursuance of the laws of the United States, shall, 'during the term of his recognisance, without the 'limits of the United States, carry on, or aid in 'carrying on, or begin, or set on foot, or provide 'or prepare the means for a military expedition or 'enterprise against any foreign Prince or State at 'peace with the United States, such recognisance 'shall be forfeited." Does this statute authorize any magistrate or court to require sureties of any person who begins or sets on foot such military enterprise? No such provision is contained in it. Is there any law of the United States that gives such authority? It is acknowledged there is none. We are then in this predicament: As the laws of the United States authorize courts and magistrates to bind persons to keep the peace, and be of good behaviour within the United States, we are, by this amendment, about to declare that, for acts done within the limits of the United States and not prohibited by any laws of the United States, the recognisance so entered into by the man and his sureties, shall be forfeited. Does not this plain and concise state of the fact show that this is the most extraordinary attempt that was ever made in any Legislature?

Besides, sir, where is this section to be found? What is the title of the bill in which it is placed? It is "a bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States." It is a maxim that every man in the community is bound to know the law; that is, that no man by pleading ignorance of the law, can justify or excuse a breach of it. But, while the justice of this maxim is admitted, we know the truth to be, that a vast proportion of the people are in reality ignorant of the law. If this is their true situation, and there can be no doubt that it is, it is the duty of legislators to make their laws as plain, explicit, and familiar as possible, that men may not be unnecessarily ensnared, and subjected to penalties and punishments for acts which were in a sense committed innocently. But, sir, would a person of common understanding look under the title of this statute for the penalty which is contained in this amendment? No man, however well informed, would search here for anything but crimes against the United States and their punishments. It would be just as natural to look in any other statute in our book as in this. What, then, will be the situation of, not only the man who is recognised under the general laws to keep the peace within the United States, but of his sureties? They, expecting to become bound for the good behaviour of the principal at home, will find themselves subjected in the amount of the penalty for acts committed abroad, which the law did not notice, and the recognisance did not mention. The bond not having been taken to protect the peace of a foreign country, but of our own, ought not to be forfeited by acts against the peace of a foreign country. As the amendment establishes the contrary principle, I think it highly objectionable.

I object to this amendment, sir, because the question cannot be tried. No intelligent, upright, and independent court will ever render judgment against a man and his sureties, in a recognisance to be of the peace and good behaviour within the United States, when the breach is laid out of the United States, and for this plain reason, the condition is not broken. No issue can be joined consistently with any rules of pleading in a case of this sort. Let it be considered for a moment. An action is brought to recover the penalty in a recognisance. The defendants will plead that they have kept and performed the condition, (which, it will be remembered, is, to keep the peace, and be of good behaviour within the United States.) The replication, then, must allege a breach. What will that be? That the principal in the recognisance has, without the United States, begun to set on foot, and aid in carrying on a certain military enterprise against the Government of the King of Great Britain, or the King of Spain. This would be a departure, and a demurrer must ensue. The statute will be nugatory and void, and no court will aid in its execution.

I object to this amendment, because, sir, it extends its reach to all countries. I know gentlemen have their eyes on countries that are contiguous, whose limits border on our own. But, it not only comprehends Nova Scotia and Canada on the East and North, Florida and Mexico on the South and West, but it extends to the utmost bounds of the earth. It protects equally the peace of the Hottentots at the Cape of Good Hope, as it does those countries which are at our doors.

But, sir, it not only extends to all lands, it also comprehends all men who tread beyond the limits of the United States, after having been previously bound to keep the peace in this country. What will be the situation of our countrymen, when thus embargoed? What, sir, will be the condition of our seamen, whose business necessarily carries them into foreign nations? A sailor, having made a prosperous voyage, and landed on his native shores, among his friends and acquaintance, first thinks of spending his money. Like a sailor, he has a frolic, and, in his frolic, violates the peace, for which, when he is sober, he is sentenced to recognise for his future good behaviour. Having rid himself of his money, like a sailor, he goes to sea again to earn more. In the West Indies he is impressed on board a British armed vessel, and there is forced to aid in carrying on some hostile enterprise against a foreign Power at peace with the United States. There is no remedy for his case—his recognisance is forfeited, and his sureties must pay the penalty.

Again, sir, I object to this amendment, because it is absurd. A man has become bound with sureties, that he will not do certain things prohibited by law, and Congress declare that his recognisance shall be forfeited, if he does another thing, which the law does not prohibit. This is not only highly unjust, but perfectly absurd. Let the principle be examined in a more plain and familiar manner. What would be the situation of the marshals in the various districts, and their sureties, if the bonds which they are by law obliged to give for the faithful performance of the duties of their office, should, by a subsequent law, be declared to be forfeited, by acts in no respect connected with their official duties? Would any man seriously defend so strange a principle? Suppose, sir, the honorable gentleman (Mr. BIDWELL) should be appointed Attorney General of the United States, and a law should be passed obliging him to find bonds for the faithful performance of the duties of that office, (and from the specimen which the Government have had from New England, I hope, if there should be another Attorney General appointed from that part of the country, he will be obliged to give bonds for the faithful performance of the duties of his office,) and, at an after period, Congress should pass a law, declaring that if the Attorney General of the United States should, when on a visit to his friends and family, be guilty of singing Yankee Doodle, his bonds shall be forfeited: What would the honorable gentleman say to such a statute? But, sir, suppose, instead of making this a part of the statute regulating the office of Attorney General, we should place it in the middle of a bill which is now before us, entitled "An act for altering the name of the district of Nanjemoy into that of St. Mary's?" Would not the honorable gentleman, in addition to mischiefs of the back-handed, side-wind operation of such a law, complain loudly of being obliged to look for it in such a strange place? And yet, the connexion between the two acts would be as near and as intimate as that which the present amendment has with the bill into which it is proposed it shall be inserted. The honorable gentleman will perhaps also say, that the cases do not compare; that it is immoral to carry on hostile enterprises against foreign Governments, but that there is no immorality in singing Yankee Doodle. In his opinion, sir, and in mine, there is none. But not so everywhere. The time has been, when Yankee Doodle, sung by an American in Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, might have bred a riot; and from such small beginnings, consequences the most serious and alarming to the public tranquillity have frequently arisen.

Take another case. Two men travel in company out of the United States into the Spanish territories, one of whom, previous to his departure, has been bound to keep the peace of the United States, the other, more fortunate, has not been bound. They join in a hostile enterprise against the Government of Mexico, and commit acts against its peace and safety. On their return, the recognisance of him who had given bonds will be forfeited, while the other is perfectly innocent. He has violated no law, and will laugh at the provisions of this section.

In the last place, sir, I object to this amendment, because it introduces a species of judicial tyranny. By judicial tyranny, I mean that kind of oppression which is produced by the instrumentality of courts, and under color of law—a tyranny the most odious, the most intolerable, of any which mankind have ever been doomed to bear. Do gentlemen wish for examples? Let them take the Inquisition of Spain, and the Star Chamber of Great Britain. Sir, but a few years since, a law was passed by Congress, which some persons considered as giving the opportunity for the exercise of this species of tyranny, and the alarm immediately spread throughout the country; the law was execrated and loaded with every opprobrious title, the public passions were inflamed, and a revolution in the political affairs of the nation, was, in a great measure, produced by it; and even now, sir, so odious is the very memory of the statute to which I allude, that gentlemen on this floor can scarcely mention it, without its drawing from them the most heart-rending groans. The statute to which I allude was commonly called the Sedition law. I beg permission, sir, to read the second, which was the offensive section of that statute, to show that its provisions were vastly less dangerous to the public freedom, than those contained in the present amendment:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall write, print, utter, or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered, or published, or shall knowingly and willingly assist or aid in writing, printing, uttering, or publishing, any false, scandalous, and malicious writing or writings, against the Government of the United States, or either house of Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with intent to defame the said Government, or either House of the said Congress, or the said President, or to bring them, or either of them, into contempt or disrepute; or to excite against them, or either or any of them, the hatred of the good people of the United States, or to stir up sedition within the United States, or to excite any unlawful combinations therein, for opposing or resisting any law of the United States, or any act of the President of the United States done in pursuance of any such law, or of the powers in him vested by the Constitution of the United States; or to resist, oppose, or defeat any such law or act; or to aid, encourage, or abet, any hostile designs of any foreign nations against the United States, their people, or Government, then such person, being thereof convicted before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years.

Now, sir, what do we find in this section of this statute? Are punishments inflicted without any previous declaration of the offence? No, sir, on the contrary, the offences are clearly and minutely defined, and the penalty as clearly prescribed. And what are the offences here detailed? They are false, malicious, and scandalous publications against the Government of the United States, or either House of Congress, or the President. Does the law say that a man shall be punished for publishing the truth? No, sir, so far from it, that, by the same law, it is expressly declared that if he publishes only the truth, he shall not be punished. And it must not only be falsehood that is published, but it must have been maliciously published, with intent to defame. The punishment also is limited; the highest penalty being two thousand dollars, and the longest period of imprisonment two years. But, by this amendment, a man who has been bound in a recognisance to keep the peace of the United States in such sum as a magistrate may have ordered, although he keeps the peace, and abstains from violating the condition of his recognisance; yet, if it afterward appears that he has done an act which was not considered at the time the recognisance was entered into, either by the judge who ordered it, or by the principal who gave it, or by his sureties who have become responsible for his performance of the condition of it, this bond thus given for another and totally different purpose shall be forfeited, and either he, or, what is more probable, his sureties, must pay the penalty, let the sum be what it may. Sir, it is the most extraordinary provision that ever was brought before a legislative body—it is a daring attack on the liberties of our country—it is an outrage on every principle of law and justice; and I trust will not meet the approbation of this House.

Mr. BURWELL was against the section. He could not, however, accede to some of the remarks made by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. DWIGHT.) The chief objection to the Sedition law, was, that Congress had no power to pass such a law—it was unconstitutional. The objections were not directed against the nature and tenor of the law. Those States where there was the most complaint, had laws substantially the same as the Sedition law. This was the fact in the State from which Mr. B. came.

The question was now taken by yeas and nays and the section negatived—yeas 9, nays 115, as follows:

Mr. DANA moved to recommit the bill: which motion was disagreed to—ayes 23; when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow, without a division.

THURSDAY, January 15.

Another member, to wit: RICHARD WINN, from South Carolina, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States was read the third time and passed without a division.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom was referred, on the third instant, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates "to an invasion of our territory by the troops of Spain, and to the adoption of measures for the protection thereof," presented a bill for the defence of the mouth of the Mississippi, and for the protection of New Orleans and its dependencies; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to continue in force, for a further time, an act, entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain parts of the island of Saint Domingo; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill prescribing the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives. After a short debate, the Committee rose and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. FISK, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding thirty thousand men.

The blanks were so filled as to bind the volunteers to continue for twelve months, unless sooner discharged, and to appropriate $500,000. The Committee rose, and the House concurred in these amendments.

After the insertion of a small verbal amendment, suggested by Mr. TALLMADGE, he moved to recommit the bill for the purpose of introducing a provision for the appointment of field officers. The motion was disagreed to—ayes 43, noes 47.

The question to engross the bill having been put, Mr. ELMER observed that, in his opinion, it contained every provision on this subject that was necessary. When the bill was ordered, without a division, to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

PUBLIC DEBT.

On motion of Mr. J. RANDOLPH, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States."

Mr. J. RANDOLPH called for the reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject, communicated the last session to the Committee of Ways and Means; which he believed contained the most satisfactory and perspicuous reasons in favor of the bill which could be assigned.

This communication having been read, the bill was considered by sections. The various blanks were filled, and some amendments introduced touching the details of the bill.

The only part of the bill on which a division was called, was on filling the blank in the third section, so as to entitle the holders of the new six per cent. stock to a sum equal to "sixty five" per cent. of the amount of the sum subscribed for by them in three per cent. stock. On this motion the House divided—ayes 52, noes 27. The Committee rose and reported the bill: the amendments proposed were immediately agreed to by the House, and the bill, without a division, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 16.

An engrossed bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of companies, not exceeding thirty thousand men, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOYLE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, who were instructed by a resolution of the House, of the eighteenth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of making further provision for the sale of the sections heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress," presented a bill making farther provision for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. GREGG presented to the House a petition of sundry merchants, traders, storekeepers, and mechanics, of the county of Washington, in the Territory of Columbia, which was received and read, praying a repeal of so much of the act of Congress, passed on the third of May, one thousand eight hundred and two, entitled "An act additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled 'An act concerning the District of Columbia,'" as prohibits the issuing of the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum on any judgment rendered by a single magistrate, where the amount, exclusive of costs, does not exceed the sum of twenty dollars; and, also, that inferior courts may be established within the said county, to have cognizance of all debts not exceeding the sum of fifty dollars.—Referred to Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. GREGG, and Mr. PHILIP R. THOMPSON; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill continuing for a further time the act for suspending commercial intercourse between the United States and certain parts of St. Domingo.

The Committee, without debate, rose and reported the bill without amendments which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the survey of the coast of the United States, and, after agreeing to appropriate $25,000 for this purpose, the Committee rose, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

PUBLIC DEBT.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States," was read the third time.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALSTON said he should have contented himself with giving a silent vote on this bill, but for the call of the yeas and nays. Having been required, he deemed it his duty to assign his reasons for voting against the bill, which he should do, although he should stand alone. He knew no advantage that would accrue to the United States from the passage of the bill. What did it hold out? The opening of a new subscription to all persons holding evidences of the existing public debt. Were the United States to be benefitted by this modification of the present debt, or were they in the least interested in it? It was clear they were not interested in it; for if they were, the keen speculator would never come forward to subscribe. For, therefore, the sole purpose of expediting the payment of the debt, the Government were about to make a sacrifice to the holders of the public debt. Who were these holders? Men who had already preyed on the interests of the nation. Mr. A. said he considered this as neither more nor less than a second assumption system, pursuing the same track pursued by the first act making an assumption of the debts. This was a measure giving this description of people, who had speculated on the interests of the country, another advantage. It held out a strong invitation to every citizen of the United States, or of a foreign nation, to subscribe to the new loan, by giving them nine per cent. more than the value of their stock twelve or fifteen months ago. Of this, he had evidence; and that, at that period, there could not be more than fifty-six per cent. got here, or at Philadelphia, for three per cent. stock. The bill, therefore, gives the holders of this stock nine per cent. on their capital. It was for this, as well as for many other reasons, that he should vote against the bill. He did not believe that the situation of the United States was such as required such a precipitancy in paying off the debt. No man was more disposed than he was to discharge the debt fairly and honorably; but he was not for doing it in such a manner as to promote the advantage of the holders of the present paper of the United States. Mr. A. repeated that he considered the bill exactly in the same light with the assumption bill, passed a long while since, and that it ought to be denominated an amendment to that law, instead of the act to which it is purposed to be a supplement.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH observed that to him nothing was plainer than that, where two individuals stood in the relation of debtor and creditor, new arrangements of existing debts, due from one to the other, might be made to the advantage of both. At present, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were authorized to purchase old six per cents., and deferred stock, at their nominal par value—that is, at the rate of one hundred dollars in specie for one hundred dollars stock, and those stocks were every year partially reimbursed at this rate. The only good, therefore, that the provisions of the bill could do the holders of these species of stock, would be, that the Government would pay them at the same rate that they were now paying them, and at which they had made purchases as fast as they could. So much for this part of the bill.

With regard to the provisions relative to three per cents., Mr. R. said, he would state a plain fact, that would come home to the simplest understanding possessed by any member of the Committee. A farmer owes his neighbor a thousand dollars, for which he has given his bond, bearing an interest of three per cent. He has it in his option to pay it off for $650. Now, do you think there is a provident farmer in the United States that would hesitate to discharge the thousand dollars by paying $650, instead of suffering the thousand dollars to rest as a burden on his children, or a lien on his estate? This is the plain question. Do the House think it most for the advantage of the estate of the good people of the United States to pay off this stock at the rate of sixty-five per cent., or let it remain a perpetual encumbrance on the nation? And is it not self-evident that an arrangement may be made between the public and its creditors, as well as between two individuals, to the mutual advantage of both?

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill—yeas 112, nays 13, as follows:

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Mr. ELLIOT observed that he had, some weeks since, presented a number of resolutions on the important subject of national defence, which it was not the pleasure of the House to refer to a Committee of the Whole.

When it should be the pleasure of the House to resume their consideration, he said, it would be his wish to withdraw the first, which had been generally considered as too abstract in its nature, and as covering too broad a field of disquisition. It would likewise be his wish to withdraw one or more of the remaining resolutions, and to propose such modifications of the rest, that it should be admitted they presented new questions to the consideration of the House; and he should then only ask that the sense of the House should be taken on referring the resolutions thus modified. Presuming that there could be no objection in the House to making such a disposition of them, he gave notice that he would, on Tuesday next, if an opening offered, move to resume their consideration for the purpose of making a disposition of them.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, in addition to the present Peace Establishment of the United States, and as a part thereof, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to raise one regiment of infantry and one battalion of cavalry; and the said regiment of infantry shall consist of the same number of commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, as are directed by the act to which this is a supplement. And the said battalion of cavalry shall consist of one major and of one adjutant, one quartermaster, and one paymaster, (each being a lieutenant,) one surgeon, and four companies; each company of one captain, one lieutenant, one cornet, one sergeant major, one quartermaster sergeant, one trumpeter, four sergeants, four corporals, one farrier, one saddler, and sixty-four privates: and shall moreover, at the discretion of the President, do duty either on horse or on foot.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President shall be, and he is hereby authorized in all cases of imminent danger, when in his opinion the defence or safety of the United States shall require it, to increase the number of men in each company of infantry on the Peace Establishment to one hundred privates.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That suitable clothing be provided for the cavalry, adapted to the nature of their service, and, as near as may be, of the value of the clothing allowed to the infantry and artillery.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, by this act directed to be raised, shall be entitled to receive the same pay, emoluments and bounty, as are allowed to the troops now in the service of the United States, and they shall be governed by the rules and articles of war, which have been, or may be by law established.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing a grant of land for the purchase of a hospital at Natchez, &c. The first section, appropriating a certain portion of land for the purchase of a hospital, was passed over without animadversion. The second section fixes the salary of the judges of the Mississippi Territory.

Mr. LATTIMORE moved to fix the salary of each judge at $2,000.

This motion, as well as subsequent motions to allow the judges $1600 and $1400 were disagreed to; when the sum of 1200 was agreed to—yeas 58, nays 25.

The third section extends the right of suffrage generally to the citizens of the Mississippi Territory, without regard to the possession of a freehold.

Mr. EARLY moved to strike out this section. He declared himself friendly to the principle, but he was of opinion that Congress did not possess the power of extending it to the inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory. In the articles of cession from Georgia to the United States, it was stipulated that this Territory should be under the same stipulations with those applicable to the Northwestern Territory, with the single exception of that stipulation which related to slavery. Those stipulations made it requisite for the elector of a Representative to possess a freehold estate. Considering this as one of the fundamental terms of the contract, he did not believe the United States possessed the power of annulling it.

Mr. LATTIMORE observed that if Congress had no power to grant other privileges to the people of the Mississippi Territory than those stipulated in the compact with Georgia, it was clear that they had already violated it. One of its stipulations was, that when the inhabitants of the Territory should amount to five thousand, they should be admitted to the enjoyment of the second grade of government. And yet, it was well known, they were admitted to this privilege at an earlier day.

Mr. SLOAN opposed the motion.

On motion of Mr. BIDWELL, the Committee rose, that further time might be allowed to consider the subject—yeas 53.

BURR'S CONSPIRACY.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH—In the President's Message, at the commencement of the session, he announced to us as follows:

"Having received information, that in another part of the United States a great number of individuals were combining together, arming and organizing themselves, contrary to law, to carry on a military expedition against the territories of Spain, I thought it necessary, by proclamation as well as by special orders, to take measures for preventing and suppressing this enterprise, for seizing the vessels, arms, and other means provided for it, and for arresting and bringing to justice its authors and abettors."

So long, said Mr. R., as the illegal movements of these persons were supposed to be directed against a foreign nation, although the interest of the United States and their honor too required, that prompt and decisive measures should be taken for suppressing their designs, yet, I believe, there is no gentleman in this House but will agree with me in the opinion that the United States, and this House in particular, could not feel so deep and lively an interest against a conspiracy of that kind, as against one for the subversion of the Union, and perhaps of the liberties of those who compose it. I have waited with anxious solicitude for some information in relation to this subject, that might be depended upon; for some official information. I contented myself, for a long time, with the belief, inasmuch as no information had been given to the House, that there were imperious reasons connected with the public welfare which forbade a disclosure; but the aspect which affairs have taken on the Mississippi is such, that I can no longer reconcile it to my sense of duty, as the independent Representative of an independent people, to rest satisfied in that state of supineness and apathy in which the House has been satisfied to remain for the six or seven weeks past. Sir, from the information I have been able to collect—and it is such that I am obliged to place great, if not implicit reliance on it—it does appear to me, that if the Government of Spain is in any wise concerned in these measures, it is concerned not as the defendant, but as the plaintiff; as the aggressing party, and not as the party on whom the aggression is made. So long as I was induced to believe that by withholding correct information from the Legislature, the substantial interests of the nation would be more essentially subserved, than by laying it before them, so long, though not without reluctance, I acquiesced in its being withheld. But, from the hostile appearances on the Mississippi, it seems to me that the state of things is such as requires the most prompt and efficacious measures for securing the Union. The bubble is said to have burst and there no longer remains any reason why the information in the possession of the Executive ought to be withheld. But, to guard against all possible objection, I have endeavored so to frame the motion, as to do away any objection arising from this consideration. It does appear—from the newspapers, it is true, but under a much higher sanction than is generally attached to information received through such a channel—it does appear in evidence, under the sanction of an examination before the Legislature of Kentucky, that ever since the peace of 1783, Spain has incessantly labored to detach the Western people from the Union; that subsequently to the Treaty of San Lorenzo she has carried on intrigues, and in the most faithless manner withheld acceding to its stipulations, in order to excite a spirit in the Western country subversive of the Union; that she subsequently made a proposition of the most flagitious kind to several leading characters in Kentucky, and as I believe elsewhere. It appears, indeed, that she has never lost sight of this object; and I believe she never will lose sight of it so long as she shall find materials to work upon, or a shadow of hope that she will succeed. It appears to me that she has found those materials; that they are of the most dangerous nature; that they are now in operation; and that, perhaps at this moment while I am addressing you, at least for a time, the fate of the Western country may have been decided.

Sir, this subject offers strong arguments, in addition to numerous reasons presented during the present session of Congress, to justify the policy avowed by certain gentlemen during the last session, so highly condemned; and if I am correctly informed, the other branch of the Legislature are now acting on that policy so contemned and despised.

[Mr. SPEAKER said it was not in order to allude to the proceedings of the Senate.]

Mr. J. RANDOLPH—I shall say no more on that point, but I will say this in relation to our own proper business: We have had a bill before us authorizing the President to accept volunteers. A member of the committee, with whom this bill originated, and with whom I had the pleasure of concurring—intimately connected and domesticated with the Secretary of War—did make a proposition before that committee, substantially the same with that rejected at the last session; to augment the military forces to meet the pressing exigencies of the times; and which I presume must have had the sanction of that officer. Is there a man in this House, who at this day doubts, that if the Government—I mean the Executive and Legislature—had taken a manly and decisive attitude towards Spain, and instead of pen, ink, and paper, had given men and arms—is there a man who believes that not only Spain would have been overawed, but that those domestic traitors would also have been intimidated and overawed, whose plans threaten to be so dangerous? Would any man have dreamt of descending the Mississippi at the head of an unprincipled banditti, if New Orleans had been fortified, and strong fortifications erected in its neighborhood? What did we then hear? Money, dollars and cents! Is there not now every reason to believe, especially when we consider the superintendence under which the expenses are incurred, that the saving of the campaign on the Sabine, and the saving of the costly measures taken by the Commander-in-chief, on his own responsibility, would have been equal to the expense of raising and maintaining for one year the additional forces proposed at the last session to be raised? There can be no doubt but on the principle of economy, without taking into view the effect on the Union, the United States would have been gainers. A spectator, not in the habit of reading our public prints, or of conversing with individuals out of doors, but who should draw his ideas of the situation of the country from the proceedings of this House during the present session, would be led to infer that there never existed in any nation a greater degree of peace, tranquillity, or union, at home or abroad, than in the United States at this time; and yet, what is the fact? That the United States are not only threatened with external war, but with conspiracies and treasons, the more alarming from their not being defined. And yet we sit and adjourn, adjourn and sit, take things as schoolboys, do as we are bid, and ask no questions. I cannot reconcile this line of conduct to my ideas of the duty of a member on this floor. Among the State authorities, there appears to be one that has acted with a promptness and decision that does it great honor. Yes, the youngest member of the Federal family has been found to be the first to ward off the impending danger, while the eldest members are sleeping, snoring, and dozing, over their liberties at home. Under this view of the subject, I beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to lay before this House any information in possession of the Executive, except such as he may deem the public welfare to require not to be disclosed, touching any illegal combination of private individuals against the peace and safety of the Union, or any military expedition planned by such individuals against the territories of any Power in amity with the United States; together with the measures which the Executive has pursued and proposes to take for suppressing or defeating the same.

Mr. CHANDLER said, he had the honor to be a member of the committee alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, and he believed, from the propositions that were made by him, he was the member referred to. He believed he had made a proposition in the committee to augment the number of the present forces, by adding to each company such a number of men as would enlarge it to a hundred instead of eighty. He made this proposition, because, from the extension of our territory, he thought it necessary, and because he thought, by thus adding to the number of our troops, without increasing the officers, the public would be as well served, without incurring the expense attending the creation of additional officers. He believed the proposition went further, and authorized the President to raise a certain number of troops, provided the public good, in his opinion, required it. He presumed, however, that the Secretary of War had never known that such a proposition was made or intended to be made, and much less had sanctioned it by his opinion. Mr. C. said, he barely mentioned this circumstance, to show that the Secretary of War did not communicate information in this way.

Mr. ALSTON believed that no man in the House was more disposed than himself to receive any information from the Executive Government, that would enable them to take the necessary steps against foreign or domestic enemies. But where did they meet with any grounds to justify the opinion that a foreign attack was meditated? The contrary was his opinion. He had heard of no circumstances which justified the belief of such an attack being meditated, particularly by Spain on the west side of the Mississippi. What was known on this subject? That the commanding officers on the part of the United States and Spain, had agreed not to violate the intervening territory, until fresh information was received from their Governments. There was no ground therefore to believe that an attack would be made from that quarter. On the contrary, if newspaper information was to be credited, the attack was to be from our own territory, and was contemplated against that very nation. If this were true, what right have we to believe in a foreign attack from any other quarter? Did evidence exist in the hands of the Executive of any such foreign attack being contemplated? If so, is there not the strongest reason to believe that we should have received information of it without a demand? Let any gentleman examine this subject, and say if it is not wise to leave the business where it now is. Whether the measures adopted at the last session, or those which were proposed, were the best, it is not, said Mr. A., for me to say. Time will determine. But this I may say—if we had then passed an act for raising a few regiments, there would not have been one of them by this time on the Mississippi. We might have got, as heretofore, a regiment of officers; but there would have been no regiments of men.

We have been further told of the policy of taking a manly attitude against Spain. We had a resolution offered to us, which in my opinion amounted to a declaration of war—not merely for defending the country on the frontier, but for carrying on a war against Spain. What was the situation of the country when this resolution was submitted? Defenceless indeed! We might have acted here, but Spain would have acted there. If the persons alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia are now in a combination with Spain, might they not have also been in a combination then; and had we assumed a hostile attitude, might they not have acted with more effect than they can now? There is not a doubt, in my mind, that as soon as it is proper, information will be laid before us without calling for it. If such a resolution be carried to the President, he will deem himself bound to communicate the whole information, in whatever terms it may be couched. I have no apprehension and feel no dread of any force that can be brought against us in the Western country. Our force there will be able to cope with any that shall be embodied against the United States and the moment the man at their head shall declare himself hostile to the Union, the very forces which he has raised will turn their bayonets against him; they will desert him. If this is all the ground that can be assigned, I think it best not to carry this resolution immediately to the President. In a few days we shall probably receive another western mail, and if the information then received shall not be satisfactory, or serious danger appears to exist, we may call for that information which is not now necessary.

Mr. J. CLAY said this was the first time that he had ever heard it stated that newspaper information was proper for legislative action. For this reason we are to wait, it seems, until we get two or three more newspapers from the Western country. He would ask if there ever were ideas so strange submitted to a legislative body? He said, he knew that it was very fashionable for the majority to express a full confidence in the Executive Magistrate; but he would ask whether this was a correct doctrine? The Constitution vested the important power of declaring war in the two branches of the Legislature. When, therefore, the peace and safety of the country were placed in the hands of the two Houses, did it contemplate that in the exercise of these powers they should depend on newspaper information? The gentleman says, if we had passed a law for raising additional troops the last session, we should not have got the troops by this time. Mr. C. said this was the first time he had ever heard delay assigned as a sufficient reason for omitting to do anything. The gentleman says, we have every reason to believe that Spain entertains no hostile intentions towards us. But take the gentleman's own source of information, the newspapers, and we have every reason to believe, that from the year 1783, that Government has been in a conspiracy against the peace and unity of the United States. We know with what determination the Minister of Spain, in 1783, endeavored to make our Ministers accede to a more limited boundary of the United States than that established by treaty. Spain has never lost sight of this subject, and sometimes by fair and sometimes by foul means has continued to pursue it.

What is the object of this resolution? We find that great alarm exists, particularly on the Atlantic board. We find gentlemen from the westward either ignorant, or pretending to be ignorant of the existence of anything alarming. Under these circumstances, the House are without official information. We are told that because we have confidence in the Executive, we ought to rely on his giving us information as soon as it is proper. Mr. C. said he would submit whether this comported with the dignity of a Representative, and whether it was proper for him to depend on newspaper information.

Mr. ALSTON said that all he had observed in relation to newspaper information was in reply to what had been said on the other side.

Mr. J. CLAY resumed his remarks; but, after uttering a few words, declared himself too unwell to proceed, and sat down.

Mr. BURWELL said, on attending to the resolution, he thought it one that was highly expedient to be adopted at this time. He viewed it as a call upon the Executive for true and precise information of acts and measures on which the peace of the Union, perhaps, depended. It was perfectly immaterial to him whether Spain, England, or France, should be implicated in the information given; whether the whole or a part of these nations were combined in the project. It was sufficient for him that the peace of the country was threatened, that the minds of our citizens were alarmed, and that this was the only branch of the Government competent to preserve the peace of the country, and tranquillize the public mind. It was clear that danger did exist; that the peace of the country was threatened by a lawless banditti, whose object was to violate the laws of the country, and to dismember the Union. It was important to know the extent of these measures, that the Legislature might be able to decide what steps it was proper to take to guard against them. There was a time, Mr. B. said, when he should have been opposed to such a resolution. That time was when the Executive was endeavoring to gain information calculated to throw light on the plot; but that time had passed by. All those engaged in it must by this time be completely enlisted and embarked in it, and nothing which the Executive shall now disclose could extricate them from being secured and punished as they deserved. If a resolution were laid on the table for an inquiry into the nature of the plot, as that might place the men concerned in it on their guard, he should be opposed to it. But was it not known to every gentleman, that the plan was so far matured that the information could not reach the conspirators in time to prevent its execution? Suppose the Executive shall state to us, that certain individuals were implicated. Can that enable them to elude punishment? No, they are fully embarked, and nothing remains for us to do, but to take such measures as the case requires. Another advantage would result from the resolution. Suppose the Executive to have taken every necessary measure, and I believe, said Mr. B. that they have, to defeat these projects, what will be the consequence? Will not this information tend to tranquillize the mind of every man in the country? Mr. B. said he repeated, that it was because he had confidence in the Executive Magistrate; because he wished for true and full information on the subject; because the disclosure of persons implicated could do no mischief, and because an official statement would tranquillize the public mind, that he was in favor of the resolution. For his part, he was ready to say that if the Executive gave information that required an augmentation of our forces, he was prepared to give him the necessary means for defending the country, under the impression that it was the duty of every member to protect the Union from internal injury or foreign danger.

Mr. MASTERS.—Mr. Speaker: From the best information I have been able to obtain, the conspiracy is yet progressing with increased ardor and zeal. If there was no conspiracy existing and not a conspirator in the United States, I believe it high time to pursue more energetic measures for the safety, security, and honor of this nation, and at least be prepared to act. Has not the Government of Spain refused to ratify her solemn treaty, and for several years manifested hostile intentions towards the American nation, and actually put her troops in motion to invade our territory? Has she not refused to recall her Minister, who has repeatedly insulted the nation, and whose recall has been demanded by the Executive? Does she not continue to procrastinate and delay the pending negotiation, probably with a view to see the result of our negotiation with Great Britain, and, stimulated by France, to view that negotiation with a jealous eye, as though there were secret instructions to operate to her disadvantage, or some other pretence for aggression?

When the committee reported the bill to authorize the President to accept of volunteers, I must confess I was astonished, because the report contained no clause for raising regular troops. I therefore called on the committee, to know if that was the only measure contemplated by the committee. If it was, I thought it very inefficient in the present state of affairs, both internal and external. I obtained no direct answer, but was informed it was only a report in part.

I wish to get the necessary information from the Executive, and to pursue active and efficient measures, and not drink of the cup of national degradation.

Mr. SMILIE.—We have had such a picture drawn of our situation, that I am willing to go any proper length. But I am surprised to hear such a representation made as would lead us to believe that we were on the eve of a war. If this representation be founded, it appears that certain persons have been perpetually intriguing, and have only waited for an opportunity to strike the most deadly blow. For one, however, I shall be indisposed, as I always have been indisposed, to go into measures of a warlike character without the most sufficient reasons. Indeed, my opinion is, that while the country is in a state of safety, we never should commit it to the horrors and hazards of war. On either side, we have nothing but newspaper information with regard to the representation that has been drawn. We know, however, from a different source, that a negotiation has been for some time depending with Spain; that that negotiation is not terminated; and that the troops of Spain, as well as our own, are on the frontier; and the commanders of those troops have made an agreement not to disturb each other until they shall have received special instructions. Does this look like being on the eve of a war with Spain? Surely not. And if not, why this extraordinary anxiety on this occasion? I do not like the resolution for this reason: it bespeaks a want of confidence in the Executive. Congress have the power to declare war and to provide the means of carrying it on; when provided, it is the Constitutional duty of the Executive to conduct it. Now, have we not already provided, or are we not already providing all the means that have been required? Do we doubt the capacity of the Executive to judge of the means that are necessary to be given, or of his using them properly? Is it to be presumed that if the President thought it necessary to apply for further means he would not have done so? Nobody can hold this opinion who does not doubt the integrity or the capacity of the President. It is his duty to do this, and if he has not done it, we must consider him either incapable of judging what is necessary, or as guilty of something worse.

An allusion has been made to the measures of the last session. It is regretted by the gentleman from Virginia that his opinions were not adopted; and he thinks he has a right to triumph, because the same measures which he then recommended are now found necessary. Suppose the same measures should now be necessary which he then recommended—which, however, I am far from admitting—are the circumstances of the country the same? It will be recollected that one of the purposes for which that gentleman wished troops to be raised was to chastise Spain. I was not of opinion that it was then necessary to chastise Spain, and I am still of opinion that it is not necessary to chastise her. Another reason has been assigned by that gentleman for those measures; it seems those measures would have prevented this internal conspiracy. It does not, however, appear that we knew of the existence of, or foresaw any conspiracy, or had any expectation of such a thing; nor did the gentleman himself apprehend or predict it. If he had entertained such opinions, it would certainly have been kind to have told us so. If, then, everything on this subject was so vague, are we to be told that it was necessary to raise troops to guard against a conspiracy that might happen seven years afterwards? In my opinion, we ought not to have raised additional troops the last year, nor ought we to raise them this year, so long as things remain as they are. At all events, I will never give my consent, during the time of peace, to raise additional troops, unless necessary for garrison duty. I believe the militia and volunteers are abundantly sufficient for all exigencies. I will, however, say this, that if it should be considered necessary, from the extension of our territory, to raise troops for garrisoning our posts, I do not know that it will meet with my opposition. But as to raising additional forces with which to go to war with Spain, I have no idea of it; and as to raising troops to crush any conspiracy that may exist, or be apprehended, I see no necessity for it. It is remarkable that we should entertain any opinions in favor of such a measure, when the President, on whom the great responsibility rests, does not consider it necessary.

Mr. S. repeated his surprise at the alarming picture which had been drawn of our situation, and his opinion that no necessity existed to adopt the resolution at this time. If he believed the President inadequate to the performance of his duty, he might be the more ready to accede to it; but, believing him fully competent, he should vote against it.

Mr. HOLLAND.—This appears to me to be a very improper course. The President is requested to tell us what measures he has taken, and what measures he hereafter intends to take, to suppress this conspiracy. This seems to me to be extremely exceptionable, and may go to defeat the very end intended to be answered by obtaining the information desired. Where is there any necessity at all for this measure at this time? Is it not the duty of the President to give us such information at all times as the exigencies of the country requires? And have we not reason to repose confidence in the Executive? If we have, this resolution is altogether useless. We have been told by the gentleman from Virginia that if the measures recommended at the last session had been adopted, he thinks it would have been much better for the country, and that all kind of danger would have been removed. I, however, am one of those who do not possess that confidence in a regular establishment, which the gentleman from Virginia possesses. Nor have I any apprehension for the peace and safety of the country. I have reason to believe that there are some desperate characters engaged in disturbing the peace of society, but I confide in the integrity of the people; and I believe the strength of the militia will always be found competent to the exigency. If I have fears, they do not arise from this quarter; they do not arise from the want of a regular establishment. The larger that establishment, the greater my fears. If any fears are to be entertained, in my opinion they ought to be fears of the disaffection of the army. I hope, however, that we have no grounds for fears at present on this head. But if there should be any such disaffection, I believe the energy of the people would be sufficient to resist it—would be sufficient to resist any danger from within or without. Thinking differently from the gentleman from Virginia, and that the safety of the country does not consist in the extent of our Military Establishment, I am for taking different measures. I am against extending the army, but in favor of organizing the militia in such a way as to render it efficient. I am, however, hostile to the adoption of this proposition. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BURWELL) has remarked that the time has come when we may safely adopt the proposition. That gentleman may have information which we do not possess, that may induce him to form this opinion. But, from the information I possess, I think differently. I believe the President will communicate to us all the information that is necessary and proper for us to possess, and his not having communicated it in this instance is conclusive evidence to my mind of the impropriety of asking it.

Mr. FINDLEY considered the resolution as of some importance, and worthy of consideration before it was adopted. He therefore moved its postponement till Monday.

Mr. BURWELL said he had a single remark to make in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina who had intimated that he might be acquainted with some circumstances not in possession of the House. He begged leave to inform him, and the other members of the House, that he was acquainted with no circumstances other than those which he had obtained through the newspapers or from official communications.

Mr. LLOYD.—When this resolution was laid on the table, it appeared to me so simple that nobody could doubt its propriety. For my own part, I shall not enter into a consideration of the measures of the last session—the propriety or impropriety of which are not now at issue. The only question before the House is this: Is it proper for this House, when the country is threatened with an insurrection or an invasion, when there is reason to think imminent danger exists, to request the necessary information, to prevent the injurious consequences that may ensue, without the application of proper remedies? I have heard but three objections made to this resolution, neither of which seems to me entitled to the least force. The first is, that if the resolution be carried to the President, he will consider it his duty to communicate all the information in his possession. But gentlemen who make this objection surely have not attended to the language of the resolution. Does it not expressly confine the request to the communication of such information as the President may think proper, and such as may not defeat any objects he may have in view? If, then, he has received any information which he may deem it improper to communicate, he is authorized by this very resolution to withhold it. I should have very little confidence either in the ability or integrity of the Executive if, in contravention of the wishes of this House, and in direct hostility to the objects intended to be answered by this request, he should communicate information which ought to be withheld. The gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. ALSTON,) who has spoken of the resolution as compelling the Executive to communicate information in his possession, must surely have overlooked its discretionary language.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has observed that the resolution appears to him as expressive of a want of confidence in the Executive. If the doctrine of confidence is to be carried to this length, that you, who are the guardians of the people, shall sit idle spectators of every impending storm, I shall never subscribe to it. However I may confide in the integrity and wisdom of the President, I owe something to myself; nor can I sit here merely to legislate under Executive patronage. I want facts on which to act. If the resolution shall be adopted, it will betray no want of confidence in the Executive; it will only manifest the zeal of the House to possess information which it is necessary for them to have before they can be prepared to act.

Mr. ALSTON.—The gentleman from Maryland says this call on the Executive is necessary. But what is the state of the case at present? Is it not the duty of the President, under the Constitution, at all times to give such information to the Legislature, as he may deem necessary and proper for them to act upon? And what is the language of the resolution?—To give such information as in his judgment shall not be improper. On this ground then, it is not necessary to adopt it. But take the subject in the view in which I before presented it. If we call on the Executive in this way, he will deem it his duty to give the information called for. I have not particularly attended to the phraseology of the resolution, but I question very much whether the qualification in the fore part of it applies to the latter part, which refers to the measures taken, or intended to be taken by the Executive. It is clear that some parts of this information may be improper to be communicated. For my part, I believe that such a communication on this subject, as is proper, will be laid before us as soon as practicable. On this point of confidence in the Executive Magistrate, I will say that I am not in the habit of subscribing to the opinions of any man, or set of men whatever. An implicit dependence on the opinions of others is altogether contrary to my habits; but can any man doubt that if there is anything in the possession of the President, proper in his opinion to be communicated, he would have conceived himself bound to have communicated it before this day? As I said before, two or three days may bring us a Western mail, and news of the extent and state of the conspiracy. Let us wait till this time; the state of things may then induce us to call on the President for information. It has been but a few days since we have heard from Orleans: there appears to exist there the greatest confidence in the Executive, and a force sufficient to meet any force that may be brought from the upper country. Do we know the extent of this combination, or all the characters implicated in it, and where they now are? If the President were to make a communication on the subject, is it not probable, that if there are any among us concerned in it, we should disclose it to those interested in making their escape, even were it communicated in confidence? May not the safety of the Union depend on defeating it before a disclosure be made? If such a disclosure be made, will not the conspirators either make a decided stand, or, by retreating, screen themselves from punishment? We have had, however, I believe, enough of confidential communications; and I hope we shall not soon have any more. I, for one, am ready to wait till the President shall deem it advisable to make a communication to this House.

Mr. HOLLAND—If we were called upon by the Executive to act in this case, it might be proper to ask for information. As, however, we have not been so called upon, and as the Executive is the proper organ for taking the necessary measures on this subject, the adoption of this resolution on our part would evince a desire to intermeddle with his duties. As the Constitution enjoins it upon him as his duty, to give information to the Legislature from time to time, I can only consider the request made, under the impression that we have not confidence in him. It is true the resolution is couched in very curious language—it requests only such information as he may deem the public welfare required not to be disclosed. But what is the balance of the information? Exactly what the Constitution enjoins upon him to give. What is the inference? That the President of the United States has not discharged the duties of his office; that he has not done what it was his duty to do; that he has been guilty of delay; and that Congress has been compelled to tell him he has not done his duty. Such considerations ought to induce us at least to hesitate before we pass such obloquy on any branch of the Government, and more especially upon the President, as the confidence we now ask for him is merely that reposed in him by the Constitution.

At the instance of Mr. DANA, the Clerk read the following extracts from the Journals of the House:

"MONDAY, January 2, 1797.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, information of what measures have been taken for carrying into effect the Treaty between the United States and the Dey and Regency of Algiers; and also, whether any, and what further Legislative aid may be necessary for that purpose."

"FRIDAY, March 30, 1798.

"On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, the despatches from the Envoys Extraordinary from the United States to the French Republic, mentioned in his Message of the nineteenth instant; or such parts thereof, as considerations of public safety and interest, in his opinion, may permit:"

"Ordered, That the consideration of the said motion be postponed until Monday next."

"MONDAY, April 2, 1798.

"The House proceeded to consider the motion of the thirteenth ultimo, relative to the despatches of the Envoys Extraordinary from the United States to the French Republic: Whereupon, the said motion being amended at the Clerk's table, to read as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House the instructions to, and despatches from the Envoys Extraordinary from the United States to the French Republic, mentioned in his Message of the nineteenth ultimo:

"The question was taken, that the House do agree to the same, as amended, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 27."

Mr. ALLEN, from the committee appointed to present to the President of the United States the resolution of this House, relative to the instructions to, and despatches from the Envoys Extraordinary to the French Republic, reported that the committee had, according to order, performed that service; and that the President signified to them, that he would take the subject into his consideration, and do thereon, what it should appear to him the public safety required."

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL.—I understand the question to be on postponing the consideration of the resolution till Monday. I have never opposed a resolution calling for information in any case where I believed the information could be of any possible use; nor am I disposed to say that it is at present necessary to negative this resolution, but I do not see any use in adopting it at this time. I ask what use is to be made of the information the resolution proposes to obtain? In introducing it, we are told that the country was threatened with a conspiracy. Will gentlemen say their object is to raise a standing army to quell it? Are we to do nothing until we get a war establishment? If so, the conspirators will have time to accomplish their object, or to fly from justice, before they are overtaken. Whatever may have been the object of the conspiracy, it is at this time either consummated or exploded. It is either carried into effect, or the probability of its being effected is destroyed. It has been said, if the measures proposed at the last session had been adopted, the country would not now be menaced from abroad, or conspiracies be engendered within. I cannot conceive the use of introducing, on this occasion, such observations. The object recommended at the last session was to raise a war establishment, not merely to encrease the existing peace establishment. This was declared the last year, and it has been declared this year. Gentlemen have said, they will not increase the peace establishment, but will create a war establishment. What were the apprehensions entertained the last year, on which the proposition of these measures was founded? Has the danger from Spain, then insisted upon, been realized? No, sir, official documents tell us the contrary. If the reason brought forward last year did not justify it, nothing has since intervened to sanction it.

Will the gentleman, who says if we had adopted the measures recommended the last session, they would have averted the dangers which now threaten us, tell us whether there was then any reason for apprehending them; will he say that he then expected this man would at this time have been carrying on this conspiracy? If, so, he surely ought to have told us of it. I am disposed to believe, that so far as relates to this, or any other combination within our limits, no standing army is necessary. If we must have a standing army, to put down our own citizens, whenever there is any serious violation of the laws, it is high time to lay down our liberties. If the militia are incompetent to maintain the peace, it is full time to acknowledge the futility of our political principles. On this ground never will I agree to raise a regular army, to meet our own citizens. As far as it depends upon me, it never shall be said, that we have raised a regular army to turn their bayonets against our citizens. If the majority of the people shall be embarked in an insurrection they ought not to be controlled; and if the majority shall be on the other side, they will have power to crush it. It has been stated, on the introduction of this resolution, that a member of the select committee who brought in the bill, authorizing the President to raise volunteers, proposed an increase of the regular army, similar, it is added, to the increase proposed during the last session. The fact, however, is this: The gentleman alluded to offered two propositions; one to add to the present peace establishment, which was rejected by all the members of the committee but himself. Even the gentleman who introduced the resolution under consideration gave his vote against this proposed increase of the peace establishment.

There is a bill now before me, from the Senate, the object of which is to increase the peace establishment; and this the gentleman says is one of the measures proposed at the last session. I have, however, already observed, that that gentleman opposed the proposition for increasing our peace establishment, and yet he informs us that this measure is the same with that proposed the last session for the creation of a war establishment. I have considered it my duty to make these observations, because, at the last session, I was opposed to raising an army; and I am still opposed to it, unless the public exigencies require it. I do not, however, consider this the proper time to investigate this point; as, if it be intended to crush the conspiracy, the measure will be too late.

It may be proper to observe that in my opinion this conspiracy has been painted in stronger colors than there is reason to think it deserves. It has been stated as dangerous to the Union. On what grounds? There is no evidence that there is in any part of the United States two hundred persons collected for the purpose of carrying it into effect. We have not even evidence of this. We have indeed newspaper evidence, that it was reported that the author of it was to march at the head of two thousand men, and that four thousand Kentuckians were to follow: At the same time, however, that Kentucky is taking the most effectual measures to crush it. So far from there being four thousand Kentuckians enlisted, I do not believe there are ten, unless, indeed, the stragglers passing through that State are so denominated.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has observed that the members from the Western country are either ignorant, or pretend to be so, of this plot. I cannot suppose the gentleman alluded to any member in this House. There is one circumstance on this head worthy of notice—the greater part of the men associated came from the Eastern country, and from the State of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. With regard to the sentiments of the Western country, I believe they are as well affected towards the Union as those of any part of the confederacy. I do not conceive there is ground for the alarm that has gone forth. I am, however, willing to take any proper measures to aid the Executive in crushing the plot.

It has also been observed by the introducer of this motion that the expenses attending the military expedition on the Sabine will be equal to the expenses that would have attended the proposed augmentation of the army. But it seems to me that this must be altogether a mistake. This expedition was composed of the regular forces and about five hundred militia, who were engaged but for a few weeks. The expenses of the former may have been somewhat increased by their movement, and the price of provisions; but no additional expense has been incurred for their pay. The only important item of expense must arise from the militia—this cannot be considerable; it will not be pretended that it can bear any comparison with the expenses of raising an army of five or ten thousand men. I am not disposed to say anything of the expenses incurred by the commander of the army at New Orleans, as I am unacquainted with the subject; but I presume it cannot be considerable.

But, to return to the only question before us; the President has informed us that there is a combination, the object of which is to conduct a military expedition against the territories of Spain. What is the information which we have since received? Does it not go to the same object? If the President is convinced, from information since received, that the object is a different one, is it not most probable that he would have so advised us? If the secret information respecting those implicated be divulged, will it not put many concerned in it on their guard, and induce them to escape? This is the evil I apprehend from agreeing to this resolution, and none other. Believing, therefore, that the information we may receive will not enable us to strengthen the hands of the Executive, I shall vote for postponing the further consideration of this resolution until Monday. The President has already advised us that he has taken such measures as are calculated to check the expedition, and bring its abettors to punishment. He possesses the power of calling out the militia if he thinks the case requires it; and I know of no acts which we can pass, which can strengthen the hands of the Executive more than the existing laws.

Mr. J. Randolph.—It appears to me that the resolution is treated, I will not say intentionally, with unfairness. It is a resolution calling for information, and yet gentlemen opposed to it call upon us for information to prove its propriety. They ask, do you know this or that? We answer, no; but we wish to know it; and that we may know it, we ask; and yet the requisition is opposed, because we cannot give them the information it calls for. If we had the information, I should suppose that circumstance would be a stronger reason for disagreeing to it. If we possessed the information, we should not want it. But it is said the danger has proceeded to such a length, and the crisis is so advanced, that nothing which we can do will have any effect. Are we then merely to call in the political undertaker to take charge of the body politic, which is defunct, to commit it to the dust? Gentlemen say it is too late to do anything. Either the affair has proceeded to such a length that it has by this time succeeded to the utmost, or is altogether defeated. But are gentlemen prepared to say that the partial success of the conspiracy shall be conclusive in its effects; that the nation will set down contented if Baton Rouge or New Orleans is reduced?

While on this subject, permit me to say that when I referred to newspaper information, I did not refer to the vague reports generally circulated through those organs of information, but to evidence legally taken in the case of Judge Sebastian, which, though found in the columns of a newspaper, I consider satisfactory evidence. If it is not, I hope some gentleman from Kentucky will get up in his place and tell us so. I alluded to this information as exhibiting the intriguing disposition of the Spanish Government from the peace of 1783 to the year 1797.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has told us of some kind of an armistice entered into between the commander of our army and the commander of the Spanish forces. But I should be glad to know from what quarter he derives this information. I believe there is no such information. There may be some tacit informal understanding; but I believe there is no armistice. If there is I have not heard of it; and will this House confide in the tacit understanding between two commanders, when they have seen the Government of Spain endeavoring to dismember the Union after entering into a solemn treaty with us? In former days we have heard much of Castilian honor and virtue. But at the present day the thing is not—it does not exist. We have evidence that while that Government was treating with one hand, she was preparing to stab us in the dark with the other.

I again invite the House to draw a proper inference from the indecent, insulting, outrageous demeanor of the Minister of Spain. I did understand that he was to have been deported—shipped off. On the contrary I find him still here; and is not the inference of my friend from Pennsylvania irresistible, that, considering the crowd of memorials presented by him to the Government in the case of Miranda, and that no remonstrance has been made against this pretended expedition against Mexico, that he is acquainted with it—that he knows that it is ostensibly for Mexico, but really for Orleans—for the severance of the Union.

Some gentlemen make extremely light of this conspiracy. I cannot, however, conceive how a man in a state of ignorance respecting its nature or extent can make light of it. The very circumstance of not knowing the extent of danger has a tendency to magnify it beyond its natural size. But there is one fact which has come so direct that it cannot be doubted. I believe it will altogether depend on the circumstance of the conspirators getting to Baton Rouge before the troops of the United States arrive there, whether New Orleans shall fall; and the waters of the Red river are so low that we cannot decide when our troops will arrive—they will get possession of the ordnance, and nothing can prevent the reduction of Orleans but a pitched battle.

But who can see, according to the intimation of some gentlemen, in the resolution under discussion, a proposition either for a war or peace establishment? It is no such proposition. It seems, however, that an expression of mine bore hard on the worthy gentleman from Pennsylvania, for which I am very sorry. But I can only say, "let the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung." But I beg leave to repel, in the most decided manner, the charge that we are triumphing at the consequences of the measures of the last year. If I could triumph at the calamitous situation of my country, there is ample cause indeed for triumph. But let me change situations with the other gentleman. Let him have the finger of scorn pointed at him; let him be denounced; let the cry of mad dog, of political defection, be raised against him; and let him see all the measures for which this denunciation was made adopted and asserted by his adversaries; would he not feel some chuckling, or would he be so base, so mean, so abject, as to lie down and say that though he knew them to be right, he dare not declare them so? You may begin with these measures, and go on from alpha to omega. The first of them is the famous non-importation law. It is gone—abandoned—given up. Another great point of difference was the bill relative to the public debt, which we have had under consideration this day. It is passed. Then comes the salt tax—passed on a recommendation from the Executive. We have next the measures for the increase of the public force—we have a bill from the Senate to that effect. And are we to be amused by a quibbling distinction between a war and a peace establishment? The force is the same in either case, ready to be used against foreign enemies or domestic conspirators; there is no difference except this, that our proposition was less obnoxious than theirs; inasmuch as the peace establishment is for all time, the war establishment merely temporary. And is it not wonderful that gentlemen who avow themselves hostile to a standing army are against a temporary, but in favor of a permanent establishment! No, sir, I cannot take a retrospect of the past without feeling a degree of conscious pride that my aid was not given, that I had no hand in the acts of commission or omission that have brought us to this deplorable state of things. I am asked if I foresaw the conspiracy of this, as he has been called, modern Catiline? and if I did not, I am desired to take no credit to myself for the measures proposed. What! Will logic of this kind go down with the House or the nation? Because we did not point out individual danger, but foretold it in the general, are we to be denied the credit of warning the country against any danger? But I well recollect there was an argument urged, if not in these words, to this effect: if you do not protect the Western people, and extend to them the benefits of a free, equal, and strong Government—I say strong, for none but an equal and free Government can be strong—they will look out for friends and protectors elsewhere; and is not this prediction verified? It is, sir—I say not this in relation to the Western people exclusively—the same would be the case in any other part of the Union. Suppose the line of Vermont threatened; that British troops should pass it in hostile array; and that the British Minister should act in the same way with the Spanish Minister; what would the public sensibility be? What it ought to have been last year—what it ought to be now.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, by passing this resolution we shall betray a want of confidence in the Executive, and more especially in the President; that he will give us such information as he thinks proper, and if we want more, we act like naughty boys, who call for more than comes to their share. Indeed! Did that gentleman, in the better part of his political life, utter such sentiments? I will warrant him he did not; and when he feels how contradictory they are to all the good old maxims of the republican party I am confident he will abjure them. As to my confidence I am not so fortunately situated as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, because my belief in men, politics, and religion, is a matter of reason as well as of faith. There never did or can exist a President of the United States who will command my confidence to the extent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I believe the cultivation of a degree of scepticism in politics would not be unuseful to that gentleman as well as others. My confidence in the Executive will depend on their conduct. If their conduct shall be such as it ought to be, they shall have my confidence. But I cannot go so far as to mortgage it to them, be their conduct what it may, without reserving even an equity of redemption. This may be an infirmity of my nature; but I cannot, I never could act otherwise. I think the gentleman said, that if, on account of the acquisition of Louisiana, it were thought necessary to increase our peace establishment, he should be willing to go as far as the bill from the Senate goes. When was that Territory acquired? Since the last session? If so, his observation is to the purpose; but to make an acquisition, obtained three or four years ago, the cause of augmenting the peace establishment of the present day is rather unfortunate, and it appears to me that if the increase of the army be intended for specific purposes, the greater the increase the worse our situation. As to standing armies, I have no great idea of them—fruges consumere nati—and with regard to our army, they are so cut up that little reliance can be placed upon them. We find one company between the two States of Rhode Island and Connecticut, one company in Boston harbor and at the arsenal at Springfield, one company appointed to defend the important port of New York, and so on. How are these men to be made troops in garrison? I believe whenever they shall be called into action they will prove they are not troops. I have no hesitation in saying, that if gentlemen depend on this broken staff they will be disappointed; and that if necessity calls for it, the best way to get an efficient army will be first to get rid of the present inefficient one. Is this arraigning the conduct of this or that department? No, sir, but that narrow policy which is pursued by the House—a policy which it is high time for us to lay down, whether we regard the saving of expense or the public safety. When I say that it is high time to lay down this narrow policy, let me be explicit. I have as much confidence as other gentlemen in the militia when at home; but if the United States were to conquer the Cape of Good Hope, I would not think of protecting the place by the militia. I believe the militia as adequate to the protection of New Orleans as the Cape of Good Hope; and after paying fifteen millions for the Mississippi and its delta, shall we be so penurious as not to defend this important point—this key to our strong box?

I hope the motion to postpone this resolution will not prevail, because I fear it has been already delayed too long. I have withheld it from the considerations I have already mentioned—from a belief that a disclosure of circumstances at the time of crisis might be injurious to the public good—from the hope that the best political measures had been taken for the public safety—and from the belief that the House of Representatives would be called in due season to take such farther measures as the exigency of the State might require. But does it follow that if the affairs of the United States are in such a situation, and the Executive has not considered it necessary to take measures, (conceding this, for argument sake,) that Congress shall take none? What does this amount to? As far as the Executive goes we are authorized to follow—not to keep pace with, much less shoot ahead of him. If there is a difference of opinion, you are in the wrong—you must submit to the mere duty of registering his edicts. I am one of those who do not feel disposed to stand on this ground. I have a respect for the opinions of the members of this House, for the opinions of well informed men out of doors, for those of the President and the heads of departments, but I do not entertain these sentiments to such an extent as to abandon my own opinions, to grope like a mole in the dark, and to be contented with what is shown me. Let us not call ourselves statesmen or legislators if we are ready to act without information. We may make a kind of conservative Senate; but higher we can never rise if we adopt a course of this kind.

Mr. SMILIE.—The gentleman from Virginia asks if I ever consented to call on the President for information. I have. But I never have called upon him for information during a pending negotiation. With regard to what I said of the Executive, I say it again, and I believe those who know me will not doubt that I have as much independence as the gentleman from Virginia.

[Mr. J. RANDOLPH explained. He did not, he said, question the independence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He only questioned the correctness of the principles which he advocated—principles on which he hoped he would never act—principles which would lead to a practical dependence, which he hoped the gentleman would abjure.]

Mr. SMILIE.—I do not know what principle the gentleman alludes to. I will state what I said before. If we adopt this resolution we betray a want of confidence in the Executive Magistrate. I say so again. It belongs to us to provide the means, and to the Executive to apply them. It his duty to ask for means when he considers them necessary. I say, when the necessary forces are prepared, or about to be prepared, such a requisition betrays an improper jealousy, a want of confidence in his judgment or integrity. If the object of the gentleman be to declare war, I agree that a call for papers may be proper. But this object is not avowed.

I agree with the gentleman from Virginia in the opinion he has expressed of standing armies, and it is because I hold this opinion that I never will agree to raise them in a time of peace. For my part I am not disposed to the knight-errantry of contending with Bonaparte; neither have I any fear of a French or British invasion. I apprehend no such designs, and with regard to this conspiracy, I think we have the means of crushing it within our reach, without resorting to an army. To me it is strange that we behold so much zeal in the East, when the Western States are so little alarmed. My object is to avoid war as long as I can consistently with honor. I consider it as among the last of evils, and I never will resort to it but in case of necessity. If the gentleman is correct in the portrait he has drawn, I will not say that it would be altogether incorrect to make use of the means he has proposed. But I entertain a totally different opinion of the state of the country.

Mr. EPPES.—I shall vote against the postponement, as involving the principle contained in the resolution. I shall vote for the resolution, because I believe the information it calls for important to the House and the country; and because I think its terms such as ought to preclude every possible objection to it. If the gentleman from Virginia had confined his observations to the resolution, I should not have opened my mouth. But when the vote I gave last year is questioned, here or elsewhere, I consider myself bound to justify it in the face of God and the nation.

Whether we shall retrace the ground of the last session I do not know. For one, however, I am against raising an army, and I call on gentlemen to show its necessity in the present posture of our affairs. What circumstances have arisen to make an army more necessary now than then? Then the armies of the United States and of Spain were arrayed against each other on the Sabine, and there was an enterprise against the Spanish possessions. What is now the situation of the United States as to its force on the Sabine? It is sufficient. There has been no time when we had not man for man with the Spaniards. An agreement is made, and our troops are withdrawn. But we are told that Orleans is to be attacked, that the safety of the country is endangered, that the very Union is at stake. Where is this danger? Do gentlemen expect, as in days of old, an army to be raised from the ground? Is not Blannerhasset, with his miserable party of 150 men, checked in every quarter? For my part, I do not know the existence of danger; and, although I shall vote for the resolution, I believe that the present force of the United States is sufficient to suppress the conspiracy and to meet the Spanish forces. The only reason that the conspiracy is not already suppressed, is, that the laws do not provide for cases less than treason. But we have just passed a law for this purpose. At present, I ask gentlemen to point out any authority by which a single boat can be seized, unless under the State laws.

As to the situation of the Western country, I feel no alarm. I do not believe the fair fame of a State ought to be impeached by the misconduct of a few unprincipled men. We may sweep the whole bench without endangering the State. The conduct of the State of Ohio has been eulogised by the gentleman himself. And what is the conduct of the Territories? In Orleans they are prepared to meet the conspirators. The merchants have patriotically come forward with a tender of their services. For my own part, I do not see in this case any indications of danger, but I am notwithstanding in favor of adopting the resolution, as the means of giving us information, which, I believe, will be valuable to the House and the country.

The question was then taken on postponing the further consideration of the resolution till Monday, and lost—yeas 38.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—Before the question is taken, I will observe, though it may seem strange, that this is not a proposition to raise a standing army, or to declare war. Nor do I see how the opinions of gentlemen on these points are implicated. For my part, I have the same opinion of standing armies now as ever. I have no disposition to raise regular forces for the defence of New York, or Baltimore, or of my native State—there is sufficient population for their defence in all those quarters. But in the country I have spoken of, there is no militia.

Again, on the subject of the situation of the State of Kentucky, I have cast no odium on Kentucky. I am happy to find Kentucky contains within her bosom honorable men enough to keep in check those that are dishonest. But I cannot draw so favorable an inference of the public sentiment in any country, when I see a most extraordinary and ramified combination, composed of the most leading characters, and the most flaming patriots too, for the express purpose of severing the Union.

In my opinion the true way of avoiding danger is not to despise it. Suppose even that gentlemen are right, and that I am wrong. If I am wrong, no danger can ensue from my error; but if they are wrong, the greatest public calamity may ensue from theirs. So, on their own principles, gentlemen ought to agree to the resolution.

I do conceive, and it gives me extreme concern, that the very mention of a disunion of these States is a great public injury; it goes to unhinge the tone of the public mind; it makes them familiar with the possibility of the thing, and once admitted into their breasts, they will not contemplate it with that abhorrence in which it ought to be held by every true patriot. If the mere talk of the thing be mischievous, what shall we think of a plan such as this is reported to be. I do not conceive it to be a thing of yesterday; but an affair of long standing. Look back to the times when the character implicated in this conspiracy first began to move in that country. It was at least contemporaneous with the disappointment of his ambition. Look further back; look at the famous propositions of Thomas Powers. It appears to me that these are parts of the same disease, and that it is a most extraordinary thing that, although so extensively incorporated into the body politic, the country should remain so long profoundly ignorant of it.

Mr. THOMAS asked for a division of the question at the words "United States." He said he had no objection to the first member of the resolution, the agreeing to which would enable them to obtain all the information that was requisite to form a judgment of the magnitude of this national calamity. He was decided against the other part of the resolution. It would go to expose the military operations, pursued under the President, for the purpose of intercepting and defeating the conspirators. It was evident to every man acquainted with tactics, that military operations, to be effectual, must frequently be conducted with the greatest secrecy.

Mr. EARLY inquired whether the yeas and nays would be taken on each member of the resolution. The SPEAKER answering in the affirmative, Mr. EARLY moved to adjourn. This motion was disagreed to—yeas 47, nays 68

Mr. STANTON declared himself against the resolution.

Mr. ELMER said he was opposed to both members of the resolution. He was not prepared at this time to vote for it, because, when such a call was made, the House ought to have some specific proposition before them on which they meant to act. No such proposition was at present before them. He added that he had full confidence that, when the President was possessed of such information as he thought ought to be communicated, he would promptly impart it.

Mr. JACKSON.—I believe it has been decided by the Speaker that, after the question is taken on the first member of a resolution, it is out of order to debate the second. As I mean to vote for the first, and against the second member, I will now assign my reasons for the vote I will give. The second member leads to a palpable absurdity. It calls on the Executive to inform us what he means to do. I am at as great a loss as some other gentlemen to determine what connexion there is between this proposition and the proposition of the last year to chastise Spanish insolence. I trust that the people will appreciate the force of the remark, that if the measure recommended at the last session had been adopted, there would be now no danger. The argument urged on this occasion is the constant pretext for raising standing armies. This measure was, however, rejected by the good sense of the people in 1799, and I trust to God it will be rejected in 1807. The argument of the gentleman goes to this, that a state of things which no human reason could foresee, is to be overawed by raising a standing army long before its occurrence. If in this case it is necessary to resort to a standing army, why did we not do so in Fries's insurrection, as well as in that of the preceding insurrection in Pennsylvania? I, however, rejoice to coincide in opinion with a great majority of the people, that the militia may be safely depended upon; and if I had not this reliance upon them, I would instantly yield up my confidence in the practicability of a republican government. But it appears to me that this question, from the extraneous circumstances mingled with it, has assumed an importance to which it is not entitled. It is merely a resolution to obtain information, part of which I think will be important, and which I am sorry gentlemen do not all agree in requesting. It has no connexion whatever with a standing army; but the mover of it, having dragged an army into the parade, rendered it necessary for those who differ from him to repel his observations.

Mr. SLOAN said, he hoped that the House would have agreed to postpone the resolution. It was in his opinion important, and a decision upon it ought not to be precipitated. He, therefore, still hoped the House would adjourn, and that, after reflection, they would entertain a different opinion from that which they at present appeared to hold. He said that he was opposed to both members of the resolution; to the first, because it was only calling on the President to do his duty, when there was no doubt that every measure had been taken by him which was necessary, and because it would be injurious at this moment, as betraying a want of confidence in him. As to the second member, it might be fraught with still greater evils.

Mr. GREGG wished to know whether it would be in order to move a postponement of the second member of the resolution after a vote on the first? When he first heard the resolution read, he was disposed to vote for the whole of it. This was a practice, when information was called for, which he had always pursued. On further consideration, the first part of the resolution appeared to him proper, but he could not view a part of the second member in the same light. He alluded to that part of it which called on the President to inform them what measures he meant to pursue. He believed that it was an unprecedented thing to require such information. He had hoped that the gentleman from Connecticut, who had offered to the House the proceedings adopted on like occasions, would have offered some precedents of this kind. If any such existed, he had no doubt he would have found and submitted them. He must, therefore, conclude that there were none such. Mr. G. concluded by saying, he had no objection to pursue the course adopted in the cases cited by the gentleman from Connecticut. He should, therefore, vote in favor of the first part of the resolution, but against the second, as it then stood.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH gave notice that, in case the first member of the resolution was adopted, he meant to modify the second.

Mr. ALSTON said, he thought the first member of the resolution required modification as well as the second. As it stood, he conceived that great mischief might result from it. He believed that, whether the President gave the whole or a part of the information called for, the conviction would go abroad that a part was retained. He believed that the resolution would have the same effect without, as well as with, the discretionary language contained in it. It appeared to him to require amendment, though he was not at this time prepared to offer one. He wished gentlemen to reflect on the difficult situation in which they might be placing the President, and to consider the step dispassionately before they took it. If the resolution were carried, he would rather the discretionary words should be struck out; and that the President might, if he thought it necessary, give the information in confidence. Mr. A. concluded, by moving to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till to-morrow.

On this motion the House divided—yeas 48, nays 68.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL said, he believed this was almost the first time gentlemen had been compelled to vote without being prepared. He had before said he had not made up his mind on the propriety of the resolution. So far as it went to obtain information from the Executive, of the nature and extent of the conspiracy, he should not vote against it; to that part of it which called for his plans, he was decidedly opposed.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the first member of the resolution, which was carried—yeas 109, nays 14, as follows:

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—The objection taken to the second member of the resolution, I am willing to allow; for, under the aspect in which it has been viewed by some gentlemen, it possesses considerable force. I mean that part of it which relates to the future measures of the Executive. I believe, on a fair construction, however, it will be found not to require the information of the measures which, as a military man, as Commander-in-chief, he means to take; but to request to be informed whether he means to rely on the existing military force, or means to call out the militia. To obtain, however, the greatest possible unanimity, I move to amend the resolution, by striking out the words "and proposes to take."

It appears to me that the House ought to know what measures are taken—to form an estimate whether those measures are, in their opinion, sufficient. It might so happen that the President has taken measures which he thinks sufficient, and the House, notwithstanding, think other measures necessary. At any rate the information can do no harm.

Mr. THOMAS asked whether the President could communicate what he had done to defeat the conspiracy, without developing what he meant to do? He said it was impossible.

The amendment was then carried without a division, when the question was taken by yeas and nays on the last member of the resolution, which was likewise agreed to—yeas 67, nays 52.

Ordered, That Mr. J. Randolph and Mr. Lloyd be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution, as agreed to, to the President of the United States.

Monday, January 19.

Mr. Cutts presented to the House a petition of sundry merchants of Kennebunk and Wells, in the District of Maine, which was received and read, praying that the term of credit for the payment of duties on goods imported into the United States from the West Indies, may be extended to the same term with the duties payable on goods imported from Europe.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. Alexander, from the committee appointed on the second instant, presented a bill prescribing the effect of records of judgments and decrees of courts of one State in another State; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

GEORGIA LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. Quincy presented the petition of James Sullivan and others, claimants of certain lands ceded to the United States by Georgia, requesting that the tribunals of the United States may be authorized to try the question of right to those lands.

Mr. Quincy moved a reference of this petition to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. Eppes spoke against the reference.

Mr. Quincy replied.

The question was taken, on referring the petition to a Committee of the Whole, which was disagreed to—ayes 41, noes 54.

Mr. Quincy then moved its reference to a select committee.

Mr. D. R. Williams hoped this motion would not prevail, and that, if it did not, that the petition would be rejected.

Mr. Quincy withdrew his motion, that the question might be taken on the proposition, which Mr. D. R. Williams then offered.

Mr. Quincy called for the yeas and nays on this motion.

Messrs. D. R. Williams, Eppes, and J. Clay, supported; and Messrs. Conrad, Cook, Alexander, Sloan, Smilie, and Quincy, opposed the motion, which was disagreed to—yeas 53, nays 56, as follows:

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

LANDS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. Rhea, of Tennessee, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of laying off and describing, by certain metes and boundaries, a tract of country, to which the Indian title hath been extinguished, within the limits of the Territory of Louisiana, and to include all the settlements within the said Territory, and for having the said tracts of country laid off into townships and sections, half and quarter sections, agreeably to the several laws heretofore made for surveying the public lands of the United States; and also to inquire into the expediency of granting one quarter section to every free white male, who now resides thereon, or who within —— years shall actually improve and reside thereon.

Mr. Conrad said, before he agreed to the resolution, he should be glad to hear the reasons for this new mode of disposing of the public lands.

Mr. Rhea said he did not suppose that on referring this subject, it would have been necessary to assign the reasons for the measure. But as they had been called for, he would state some of them. It was well known that the settlements in the Territory of Louisiana were scattered, that they were two or three hundred miles apart. If the Indians should become hostile in that quarter it would probably cost the United States more to protect those settlements, than the value of the land it was proposed by the resolution to allow to settlers. The object was to effect a settlement that would prove a strong barrier, and avert the necessity of maintaining a standing army. The lands on this side of the Mississippi, it was well known, from their subjection to Indian claims, would not probably be settled until a distant day; and this produced a necessity for forming settlements on the western side of that river.

Mr. Smilie believed this was a measure that would be attended with great benefits to the United States. As the motion was merely to refer for the purpose of inquiry, he hoped it would not be opposed.

Mr. Varnum was of the opinion that, even if this measure should be ultimately considered advisable, this was a very unseasonable time for its adoption. He was not of opinion that any considerable force could be brought to bear on the frontier thus proposed to be guarded. It would be remarked that it was not contemplated for the defence of the Orleans, but the Louisiana Territory. And he asked whether it would be proper to adopt it while such various reports prevailed of the existence of conspiracies against the United States in the Western country. Might not the individuals, engaged in these combinations, on their discomfiture and return into the United States, under this measure, occupy the lands thus proposed to be surveyed?

Mr. Rhea declared himself greatly surprised at the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. As to the suspicions afloat, he hoped they would have no influence on the adoption of this measure.

Mr. Gregg hoped, as the resolution contemplated an almost radical change of the land system, it would be suffered to lie for consideration.

Mr. Rhea acquiesced in this course.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The bill from the Senate supplementary to the act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, was read the first time.

Mr. Eppes said, that on ordinary occasions, he had no objection to bills which made their appearance in that House passing through the ordinary forms; but it appeared to him that there were some occasions, which not only justified, but required an extraordinary course of procedure. Of these latter occasions, he knew of none that more imperiously required extraordinary treatment than the bill which had been just read. What was its object? Not to provide for an extraordinary emergency, but to make a great addition to the permanent Military Establishment of the United States; almost to double the existing military force. Where was the evidence of its necessity? The bill appeared in a naked form, unsupported by any documents whatever. He believed it objectionable in its principle, in its details, and in its origin. In the second section, a discretion was given to the Executive to increase each company from its existing complement to one hundred men. It consequently gave the Executive the dangerous discretionary power of increasing, whenever he shall think it necessary, the permanent establishment nearly double its present amount. He had also an objection to the origination of this bill. The Constitution expressly provided that every revenue bill should originate in the House of Representatives, and though he would not undertake to say that this bill violated the words, yet it certainly was repugnant to the spirit of the Constitution. What did it propose? To lay a burden of the most oppressive kind on the people, in a time of peace. Believing that the bill originated in mere rumor and report; that it was not founded on any official information; and that it was altogether unnecessary in the present state of affairs, he moved that it be rejected.

Mr. Thomas called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Lyon asked whether the gentleman could safely say that the country was in a state of peace. What was to keep the American and Spanish armies apart? Were they not ready to shed each other's blood? Could it be said that this state of things was safe, when we had not a sufficient force on the frontier to prevent the invasion of our country? Did we not hear that the Spanish forces were twice, four times, ten times, greater than ours? Further, he heard of no information from Europe of a settlement of differences in that quarter. All that we did hear was, that the Spanish General on the frontier declared that he would wait until he heard from Europe. And yet we are told it is unnecessary to raise additional troops.

Mr. L. said, from the time we had acquired our new territory, he had uniformly thought it proper to raise three or four additional regiments. He should not therefore vote for rejecting the bill. His wish was to see the country in a better state of defence in every quarter; and as the militia of that part of the Union which he represented were likely to be almost the first that, in case of an invasion, would be called out, and as many of them would have a thousand miles to march before they reached the frontier, he was peculiarly solicitous to have a standing force competent to the defence of the country, except on the most pressing emergencies. Are we not also told that an attack is contemplated on New Orleans; that a new Empire is about to be established in the West? Will it then be said that we do not want additional troops? Are we sure of it? Mr. L. said he did not understand how gentlemen could be much alarmed, and yet say that they wanted no additional troops.

Mr. Tallmadge said that he took the ordinary course on such occasions to be, to discuss at its second reading the merits of the bill. This treatment of the other branch of the Legislature was no more than decent and respectful. Unless there was some substantial reason, they ought not to deviate in this instance from the course which was ordinarily pursued. He did not see any substantial reasons why this bill should be rejected. In the outset of the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia, he observed that they were about, at one stroke, to double the Military Establishment of the United States. The present establishment of the United States consisted of two regiments of infantry and one regiment of artillery, together with a corps of engineers. When the proposed addition shall be made, the Army will consist of 5,400 men. This certainly will not be more than an increase of one-half of the present Peace Establishment. What are the objects and peculiar grounds for increasing the present Military Establishment, was worthy of inquiry. Can we say there is no necessity for such an increase? Are we justified by any information we possess in saying that the Senate had no sufficient cause for this measure? Do gentlemen mean to say, that, by passing the bill for raising volunteers, they have provided a sufficient force to defend the country? Mr. T. said he was apprehensive, when that bill was under consideration, that in case it should be passed, this argument would be made use of to satisfy the people that the country was adequately defended; and he was therefore opposed to the bill. He did not believe that that provision was sufficient for the defence of the country; and he did think, in the present state of affairs, there was a loud call on the Legislature to make some addition to the present Military Establishment, competent to repel foreign aggression, and which might enable the President to put down promptly and effectually any lawless attempt which might be made to disturb the peace of the Union. Mr. T. said he felt reluctant to place the whole reliance on the yeomanry of the country. He feared, if this should be the case, that they would prove to be a broken reed, which could not be depended upon. He was, therefore, for making a considerable addition to the Military Establishment of the United States. Rather than not have a force which would enable the President to chastise the enemy on our frontier, and to crush any persons who might attempt to disturb the peace of the Union; rather than not do this, Mr. T. said he would cheerfully agree to double the present forces of the United States. He believed, if they relied on the militia exclusively, they would oppress the yeomanry of the country, and spend more money to but little effect than if a stable force were provided. As far as his opinion went, some modification of the bill appeared to him necessary; but as this was only a question on rejecting the bill, it was unseasonable to say anything at present on its details. For the reasons he had stated, he hoped that the gentleman would either withdraw his motion, or that the House would give it a decided negative.

Mr. Eppes said, he thought when he was before up, that he had drawn a decided line of distinction between the measures of preparation that were necessary against the Spaniards and the provisions of the bill under consideration. The two propositions were totally distinct. If gentlemen thought it necessary to raise troops to chastise the Spaniards, let them bring forward a proposition to that effect. But let us not in this way be surprised into a measure for almost doubling the present Military Establishment, which, although passed within one hundred and twenty feet of this House, very few gentlemen knew any thing of, until it was brought to us from the Senate. Mr. E. said the great objection which he had to the bill was, that he considered it as an usurpation of the Senate. It appeared to him that the Constitution made the House of Representatives the exclusive organ of imposing burdens on the people. How was this burden to operate? Not on the States, as independent sovereignties, but on the great body of the people. It ought therefore to originate with that House as their immediate Representatives.

Mr. E. said he believed that, in no case, had such a measure originated in the other branch of the Legislature, except in the famous case of the motion of Ross, which terminated in calling out the militia. Gentlemen had pronounced this an indecorous treatment of the Senate. How indecorous? Mr. E. said he had observed, when he made the motion, that in ordinary cases he had no objection to the usual forms of the House; but that he considered extraordinary cases as calling for extraordinary treatment. Had not the House, by their proceeding, justified the remark? Did they not recollect the memorable case of the last session, when a measure which originated in the other branch, odious to the House and to the country, had been promptly and decidedly rejected? This then was a precedent, which, in his opinion, applied with equal force to the present case. The bill contained a principle obnoxious to the House, obnoxious to the nation, for nearly doubling the standing force in a time of peace, and for imposing, without necessity, a great burden on the people. He trusted, therefore, that the same course would be pursued in this instance which had been adopted in the other.

Mr. Early said it appeared to him, that the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Virginia would operate with equal strength for pursuing the same course as to any bill which might be received from the other branch of the Legislature, on which there should be a difference of opinion between the two Houses. Without going into an examination of the merits of the bill on the table, he was free to declare his decided hostility to the course urged by the gentleman from Virginia. What was likely to be the consequence of a treatment so disrespectful to the other branch of the Legislature? If they possessed the ordinary feelings of men, it could not be expected but that they would retaliate, and thus put an end to the business of the nation. Mr. E. said, he thought one or two of the observations of the gentleman merited some notice. He had remarked that the origination of this bill was a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. Mr. E. said, he had supposed that all doctrines about the spirit of the Constitution were unfashionable at this day, and that the fashionable doctrine now was, to take that instrument as it stood, and construe it as it read. But he would examine the question. The Constitution had provided that all bills for raising revenue should originate in this branch of the Legislature. But was there not a substantial difference between the business of raising and that of spending money? And did it follow, that because the Constitution exclusively vested the right of originating bills for raising revenue in this House, it therefore confined the origination of bills for spending it to them likewise? Did not the other branch of the Legislature every day exercise the same power which had been used in this bill? What would follow from a contrary doctrine? That the other branch could not even originate a bill for erecting a light-house, or for fortifying our ports and harbors, or indeed any bill that required money to carry it into execution. And was it not a fact that four-fifths of our laws demanded the expenditure of money to carry them into effect? Another objection to the bill was, that it was brought before us without documents or information to show its necessity. And was that a reason for the course suggested by the gentleman from Virginia? Was it not, on the contrary, the best reason for waiting until they got information? Mr. E. said he thought it was the best possible reason for referring the bill to a select committee; and he trusted that this was the course the bill would be suffered to take.

Mr. Varnum said he certainly should not vote for the rejection of the bill on the grounds assigned by the gentleman from Virginia. He knew of no bills, except those for the raising of revenue, whose origination was exclusively confined to this House. He presumed, however, that the question would turn on another principle—whether it was proper to augment the peace establishment of the United States. At present we have 3,200 men, besides the corps of engineers, and this bill proposes to add to the present establishment 2,200, making in the whole 5,400. The question then, which presented itself, was, whether it was necessary to have this number of troops to garrison our several posts in a time of profound peace? For, he had no idea, that on every spur of the occasion, on every appearance of war, however remote, those who were attached to standing armies should crowd into the peace establishment an additional force, only necessary in case of an emergency. Even if there was a prospect of war with Spain, that would not furnish a sufficient motive for increasing our peace establishment. He trusted, however, that that event would not take place. He did not know any grounds for expecting it. It was true, the Spanish army had marched into the country we claim, and our troops had marched into the country they claim. The question in dispute was, the demarcation line between the two countries. If this should be settled by the two Governments he did not know of any cause of war between them. If it were not settled, he would ask gentlemen whether they were sure that the claim of the United States was so well founded as to justify the going to war? It might be the voice of the country to do so; and if so, Mr. V. said he would go with them in raising a sufficient force; but until this were decided, he believed it unnecessary to add to the standing force. He was the more inclined to be of this opinion, as he heard of no complaint, by the Executive Government; and as everything required by them of the legislative body had been done. It has been said that it is inexpedient on such occasions as had recently occurred, and on those which are likely to occur, to call out the militia. Mr. V. said he entertained a different opinion on this subject; and said that he believed it important that they should be called out, whenever there were any serious differences on our frontier. Such requisitions had a tendency to train them and to make them acquainted with service and subordination. He believed it had been useful to call them out the last year as well as this.

Mr. V. repeated that, until they determined on war, it was inexpedient farther to add to the standing force than might be necessary for garrisoning our posts. Whether the proposed mode was the best to decide on the merits of the bill, he did not know. But, if the minds of gentlemen were made up on the subject, it might be most eligible to express them promptly and decidedly. If, therefore, he voted for rejecting the bill, it would not be out of disrespect to the Senate, or from any doubt of their power to originate it, but on the grounnd that the measure was unnecessary.

Mr. Findley said he was not prepared at present with certainty to say that he should vote for the bill, with any modification that might be made to it. But he did not know that he had ever voted on a bill without its previously going through a Committee of the Whole. And as in this case, one of the reasons assigned for rejecting it was a doubt of the power of the Senate, he could not agree to the motion. He recollected to have heard the following reasons assigned for the rejection of a bill in one branch of the Legislature, by a member who had been called upon to assign them: "You voted against our bill, I therefore voted against yours." Mr. F. said, although he might ultimately vote against the bill, he should be opposed to its rejection in this stage of it.

Mr. Lyon said he was not so alarmed at the idea of a standing army, as some gentlemen declared themselves to be. He doubted whether the United States would for a long time have an army so large as to be a fit object of fear. He said he believed it was owing to the prudence of General Wilkinson that we were not at war with Spain at this time. He firmly believed this would have been the case, but for his arrival on the frontier. He wished to know what hopes there were of being on good terms with Spain? He was not willing to sit down and say all was safe, when it was not safe—not that he dreaded anything from the insurrection that was so much talked of. He should vote for defensive measures in every form in which the subject was presented. Let those in power save the country, let them save its honor as well as its territory.

Mr. Smilie said he was so hostile to this bill, that he should vote against it in every shape, and at every stage in which it should be presented. He should, therefore, vote for its rejection on this occasion. He was not anxious as to the stage in which it should be rejected, provided it were ultimately rejected; nor was he prepared to say this was the best way of rejecting it. But as they must come to the question at last, and as he was decidedly of opinion there were no circumstances between the United States and any foreign nation, or any questions of an internal nature which required this step to be taken, he should certainly give it his negative. If he could think with the gentleman from Kentucky, that there was no danger to be apprehended from a standing army, even though it amounted to 40,000 men, he might feel easier on this subject. But he entertained a far different opinion. It was a singular circumstance, and Mr. S. said he believed it peculiar to this country, that a disposition on this subject existed in some gentlemen to outrun the Executive. Far different was the sentiment which prevailed in other countries. In England, for instance, the constant object of the Executive had been to get a standing force; but while the Parliament was independent, an uninterrupted struggle was kept up on this point with the regal power. Since, however, the Parliament became dependent on the royal favor, the Executive had only to ask, to get what forces he wanted. It was certainly a singular spectacle to see gentlemen in this country endeavoring to outrun the Executive in accumulating a military force. What is our situation? Are we at peace or in war? We are certainly at peace. It was true, there existed some uneasiness between our Government and that of Spain as to boundaries. Their troops had marched to maintain what they considered their boundary, and ours to maintain what we considered ours. Mr. S. said no information had come within his knowledge that justified the opinion, that the Spanish officer ever had orders for the march which he had made. But, be that as it might, the matter was accommodated by an agreement that things should remain in the state they were. What was our situation with the Spanish Government? There was a negotiation depending. Under these circumstances, are we, said Mr. S., called upon to raise an army? Is there any change of situation to justify it? Can there be any reason for such a measure, unless we mean to grant an army to provoke that nation to a rupture? For my part I do not know whether we are not indebted to the smallness of our forces for the conciliatory disposition which has prevailed. It is far from improbable that a mutual distrust of their strength produced an accommodation between both sides. But are we now disputing as to the extent of force which is necessary? No; the difference is as to its quality. We say that volunteers are sufficient. It is true, the gentleman from Connecticut tells us, that militia and volunteers are a broken reed, and that we shall be disappointed if we depend upon them. I know such ideas are very consentaneous with the ideas of some gentlemen. I, however, have no doubt that volunteers can be procured, and that they, in connexion with the militia, will be competent to every exigency of affairs. The same gentleman says, an additional standing force may be necessary to suppress insurrections. But if we have got to this situation, we may bid adieu to our liberties; we may abandon them, and submit to the humiliation of maintaining a constant standing force. But I trust in God, so long as our people are conscious of the happiness they enjoy, they will never be reluctant to lend their aid in support of the Government of their choice. I have no doubt that this will long continue to be the case. If, however, on the contrary, the ideas of gentlemen be correct, we must keep a standing force everlastingly, lest an insurrection should occur. Will gentlemen be good enough to recollect the means used in other countries to raise standing armies, and to keep them when raised? I have no fear of the existing standing force. I know it cannot endanger the liberties of this nation. But it is the principle of the bill to which I object. If in time of peace we resort to such a measure, are we not pursuing the same course that has been so wofully adopted by other nations? Look at the British Government. After the Revolution was at an end, the reduction of the army was proposed; the King opposed it; but there was interest enough to effect it. When Governments want a standing army, the universal cry is, that there is danger from this or that quarter. In 1715 the rebellion took place in Scotland, and the Parliament granted the King 4,000 men. When this rebellion was quelled, the Parliament thought it unnecessary to keep up this army. But the King said no; we have bad men among us that require to be kept in check, and the army was not dismissed. Trace the whole history of this nation, from its beginning to the present day, and you will find the Government, on the pretext that is now urged, gradually increasing the standing army from 1,000 to 100,000 men. The same measure is now proposed, and, depend on it, if it is now adopted, it will form a dangerous precedent in future times, of which the friends of a standing army will not fail to avail themselves.

Mr. Gregg.—On this occasion I shall vote directly contrary to my colleague, though I shall not consider myself as pledged by that course ultimately to vote for the bill. I feel myself at a loss for information. The bill does not come accompanied by any documents whatever. The proper course, I think, will be to refer this bill to a select committee, to inquire whether there are any grounds for it, and to consult the head of the War Department, whether an increase of our present establishment is necessary. We have been frequently told on this floor that there is danger in the Western country; that the force stationed there is not competent to its defence. If this shall be found on examination to be really the case, I presume there will be no objection to raising the force which shall be judged sufficient. The Administration, finding it necessary to collect all the troops at one point, may render it expedient to raise a small body of troops in the meantime to do garrison duty, to supply the places of those despatched to the westward. I believe a committee was appointed on defending the Mississippi. If that committee has not reported in full, it may be the most proper one to refer this subject to. They may report a statement of facts which will throw light on the subject. But rejecting the bill in this stage without data, will be unprecedented in the House. For my part, I have never witnessed anything like it. I hope, therefore, the bill will either be referred to a Committee of the Whole, or to a select committee.

Mr. Cook.—I am opposed to the rejection of this bill for several reasons. I believe the doctrine of the gentleman from Virginia, that the Senate has not the power to originate such a bill, unsound; inasmuch as I believe they have a concurrent power with this House to originate all bills except for the raising of revenue. I also consider such a course as highly indecorous. I likewise consider the existing state of things as requiring some augmentation of the existing standing forces. If the present standing army was sufficient when it was created, I am of opinion that it is necessary at this time to increase it. On this question, therefore, I will give my vote, on the same principles as I would have done on the establishment of the present force, under the impression that our Military Establishment ought to increase with the increase of our territory. Indeed, I believe if we reflect that, in consequence of our new acquisitions, we have an increased number of vulnerable points, it would constitute an argument for augmenting the Army even beyond the increase of our territory. I do not, therefore, consider myself as being in favor of a relative increase of the Army, but as being only in favor of apportioning it according to the principle we have already established.

Mr. G. W. Campbell.—I will submit a very few remarks to the consideration of the House. I should have preferred that this subject had been permitted to have taken its ordinary course; but as a motion has been made to reject the bill, and it is necessary to give a vote upon it, I shall give that vote which I should have given, had the bill taken its ordinary course, and I shall consequently vote for its rejection. I shall do this under the impression that we have no evidence before us that shows the necessity of increasing at this time the existing Military Peace Establishment more than we had at the last session, when the opinion of the House was decidedly given against a similar measure. I wish to be understood as drawing a material distinction between an increase of the Military Peace Establishment, and the raising a force for any pressing exigency. If it shall appear that the country is in danger of an attack from a foreign Power, I am among those who will be in favor of raising a sufficient force to repel such an attack, and to maintain the dignity of the United States. But until danger arrives, or there shall be a declaration of war, I shall never be for increasing the Military Establishment. In the Message of the President we are told, "The result of our negotiations, or such 'incidents in their course as may enable us to 'infer their probable issue; such further move-'ments, also, on our Western frontier as may 'show whether war is to be pressed there, while 'negotiation is protracted elsewhere, shall be 'communicated to you from time to time, as 'they become known to me."

So far then as we may depend on information from the proper department, there is no foundation whatever, for increasing the Military Peace Establishment, or for raising any additional regular force. Since the receipt of the Message, has any information been received that the result of our negotiation with Spain is known? If gentlemen possess any such information, why do they not give it to us? But we are told of the rumors of war on the frontier. But I cannot think that gentlemen attend dispassionately to the existing state of things when they make this representation. The forces of Spain, we are told, are not authorized to infringe the rights of the people of the United States, or in any degree to act offensively. They have laid claim to a small tract of country, which the United States have taken possession of, and to assert this claim they have passed, what we call the boundary. But when they came to this boundary line, about thirty miles on the side of the temporary line fixed by our Government, (the interval between which lines is uninhabited,) they expressly declared they were not authorized to go further, or disturb the United States. And when mutual arrangements are made, in a spirit of forbearance and accommodation, between the commanders of the two armies, where can the danger be of war? From her own declarations, Spain has no more right to attack our frontiers with her armies than she has to attack New York or Baltimore with her naval forces. And consequently, if it be necessary to raise a force to protect the frontier against the invasion of her army, it is equally so to defend the citizens of the Atlantic board against her navy. If you can put no faith in what she says, declare war; but until you do this, treat her as you would do other nations, and consider yourselves in a state of peace until you are actually engaged in war.

It has, indeed, been said, that the conspiracy which has occasioned so much conversation may be dangerous, and that we ought to have a military force to crush it. I did not, however, believe, that any man, who is the professed friend of a Republican Government, would vote for a standing army to put down conspiracies or combinations, and so awe the people into submission; such a force as shall intimidate our citizens from combining together, through fear, not of the civil authority, or the nation, but of the army. This I consider as infringing one of the most sacred principles of the Constitution, to wit, that the militia is to be relied on in all such cases. I cannot, therefore, believe that the House will countenance such an idea, as that a standing army shall be raised to overawe the people of the United States. I believe we may safely rely on the militia to suppress all combinations of this kind.

Mr. Elmer said he was opposed to the bill, and should finally vote against it. He did not believe that an augmentation of the army was necessary either to repel invasion or to suppress insurrection. But inasmuch as the bill under consideration came from the Senate, and it was decorous and proper to consider the subject, he was not disposed to a rejection of the bill. He thought it proper to inquire whether some increase of the existing Military Establishment was not necessary for garrison duty.

Mr. Lyon said, if he understood the gentleman from Tennessee, he had insinuated that he wished to raise an army to overawe the people. He had said nothing like it. He said he had no apprehension from the rumors to the westward.

Mr. G. W. Campbell replied, that in the remarks he had made, he had no reference whatever to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. Lyon said he was in favor of an augmentation of the Army, in consequence of the extension of our territory, which presented a frontier of more than a thousand miles. He thought as highly of the militia as any man, but could they expect the militia of Massachusetts to march for the defence of Orleans? Let us, said Mr. L., talk rationally and act rationally.

Mr. Alexander.—After the time so unnecessarily taken up, as I think, in this discussion, and after the reiterated calls for the question, I shall make but a few observations. I shall give my vote in the negative on this ground. I do hold it proper that all the bills received from the other House should take their proper course; nor am I prepared at once to say, that some augmentation of the peace establishment may not be necessary. If on examination it appears to be necessary, I shall vote cheerfully for it. I apprehend that the country is not in a state of perfect tranquillity, though it is not in a state of war. But I shall at present forbear from entering into any of these considerations, satisfying myself with saying that I am in favor of treating the bill with respect.

Mr. T. Moore.—It is with reluctance that, at this late hour, I rise to offer my ideas on the subject. I shall confine myself merely to observing that I am opposed to the bill; but, from that respect with which I think the proceedings of the other branch ought to be treated, I am for suffering it to take the common course of bills in this House. I shall therefore vote against its rejection at present, but shall eventually vote against increasing the army, unless there shall appear to be an absolute necessity for it.

Mr. Bedinger.—I should not trouble the House, but for the observations of gentlemen that we ought to act in this case decently. In my opinion, we have spent the day decently. A petition was first presented to us, which we were told it was not decent to reject. It was determined not to reject it; it was read; and the gentlemen said it ought not to be referred, and the House determined not to refer it. Did not this amount at last to the same thing? And what is the language we now hear? Gentlemen come forward and tell us they are well aware of the dangers of a standing army, and they are against rejecting this bill which goes to create one. Let me tell them, that if they once get a corps of officers, it will not be so easy to get rid of them decently.

The yeas and nays were taken on the question "Shall the bill be rejected?" and stood, yeas 26, nays 95, as follows:

Tuesday, January 20.

Mr. Bedinger, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the eighth instant, the engrossed bill to prohibit the importation or bringing of slaves into the United States, or the Territories thereof, after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seven, reported an amendatory bill to prohibit the importation or bringing of slaves into the United States, or the territories thereof, after the thirty-first day of December next; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

An engrossed bill to continue in force for a further time an act, entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain parts of the island of Saint Domingo," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to provide for surveying the coasts of the United States, was read the third time and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the erection of certain light-houses, and the fixing of stakes, buoys, and beacons, at certain places therein named. The bill was reported with amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to annex certain shores and waters to the district of Mississippi; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said amendment, together with the bill, be recommitted to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, made on the thirtieth ultimo, who were directed by a resolution of the House, of the eighteenth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediencey 'of repealing so much of the act of Congress, of 'the twenty-third of March, one thousand eight 'hundred and four, as limits the time in which 'locations of Virginia military warrants shall be 'made;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a further time of —— years, from the twenty-third of March next, be allowed for locating warrants granted by the State of Virginia to her officers and soldiers upon Continental establishment; and that a farther time of —— years, from the said twenty-third of March next, be allowed to return surveys on said locations.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee on the Public Lands do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

Mr. Quincy observed that at common law the owners of vessels were responsible to any extent for the contracts of the masters, a principle which may in some cases be felt as a very serious evil. The English Parliament were so sensible of the evils of this principle, that in 1734, they restricted by statute the responsibility to the value of the ship and the freight; but that statute had not been understood to extend to this country. The principle of that statute is found in the laws of all the commercial nations in Europe. A suit has lately been instituted against a merchant of distinction to the amount of $25,000, for the conduct of a shipmaster in the East Indies; which suit has excited considerable alarm in Massachusetts. Mr. Q. proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law how far the owners of ships shall be answerable for the acts of the masters and mariners.

The resolution was agreed to—yeas 63.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making a donation of land for building a hospital at Natchez, &c.

The section extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of the Territory, without the qualifications of a freehold, was again read.

Mr. Bidwell advocated this section on the ground of expediency, and defended it against the charge of being repugnant to the compact between the United States and the State of Georgia. He maintained that the stipulations of the ordinance for the Northwestern Territory were of two kinds; some of which could only be altered by the consent of two parties, while the others were alterable by Congress alone. The parties, contemplated by the ordinance, were the United States and the people of the Mississippi Territory, and not the United States and the State of Georgia; that, however, the stipulation, which bore on this case, was one which was revocable by Congress alone.

Mr. Early contended, on the other hand, that the parties to the compact were the United States and the State of Georgia; and that its stipulations could not be altered without the consent of both. He said, he had no doubt, if application should be made to the State of Georgia, her consent would be cheerfully given to the modification proposed.

Mr. LATTIMORE maintained the same principle with Mr. BIDWELL.

Only fifteen members rising in favor of striking out the section, the motion was lost.

Mr. EARLY moved to strike out the first section, which applies a tract of land towards the erection of a hospital at Natchez

Mr. EARLY observed that, agreeably to the articles of cession by Georgia to the United States, it was stipulated that $1,200,000 should be paid by the United States to the State of Georgia, out of the first proceeds of the ceded lands that should be sold.

Mr. LATTIMORE enforced the propriety of the grant for an institution loudly called for, not on local but general considerations, as the city of Natchez was known to be resorted to by more emigrants from all other parts of the United States than any other place of its size. He also remarked, to show that the objection of the gentleman from Georgia was invalid, that a grant of these lands had been already made for the endowment of a university.

Mr. BLOUNT spoke in favor of the motion which was agreed to—ayes 43, noes 30.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

INDIANA TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana Territory, enclosing certain resolutions passed by the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the said Territory, relative to a suspension, for a certain period, of the sixth article of compact between the United States and the Territories and States northwest of the river Ohio, made on the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven; which were read, as follows:

Resolved, unanimously, by the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, That a suspension of the sixth article of compact between the United States and the Territories and States northwest of the river Ohio, passed the 13th day of July, 1787, for the term of ten years, would be highly advantageous to the said Territory, and meet the approbation of at least nine-tenths of the good citizens of the same.

Resolved, unanimously, That the abstract question of liberty and slavery is not considered as involved in a suspension of the said article, inasmuch as the number of slaves in the United States would not be augmented by the measure.

Resolved, unanimously, That the suspension of the said article would be equally advantageous to the Territory, to the States from whence the negroes would be brought, and to the negroes themselves.

To the Territory, because of its situation with regard to the other States; it must be settled by emigrants from those in which slavery is tolerated, or for many years remain in its present situation, its citizens deprived of the greater part of their political rights, and, indeed, of all those which distinguish the American from the citizens and subjects of other Governments.

The States which are overburdened with negroes would be benefitted by their citizens having an opportunity of disposing of the negroes which they cannot comfortably support, or of removing with them to a country abounding with all the necessaries of life; and the negro himself would exchange a scanty pittance of the coarsest food for a plentiful and nourishing diet, and a situation which admits not the most distant prospect of emancipation, for one which presents no considerable obstacle to his wishes.

Resolved, unanimously, That the citizens of this part of the former Northwestern Territory consider themselves as having claims upon the indulgence of Congress in regard to a suspension of the said article, because at the time of the adoption of the ordinance of 1787 slavery was tolerated, and slaves generally possessed by the citizens then inhabiting the country, amounting to at least one-half the present population of Indiana; and because the said ordinance was passed in Congress when the said citizens were not represented in that body, without their being consulted, and without their knowledge and approbation.

Resolved, unanimously, That, from the situation, soil, climate, and productions of the Territory, it is is not believed that the number of slaves would ever bear such proportion to the white population, as to endanger the internal peace and prosperity of the country.

Resolved, unanimously, That copies of these resolutions be delivered to the Governor of this Territory, to be by him forwarded to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, with a request that they will lay the same before the Senate and House of Representatives, over which they respectively preside.

Resolved, unanimously, That a copy of these resolutions be delivered to the delegate to Congress from this Territory, and that he be, and he hereby is, instructed to use his best endeavors to obtain a suspension of the said article.

The resolutions were referred to Mr. PARKE, Mr. MASTERS, Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, Mr. SANDFORD, Mr. ALSTON, Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW, and Mr. TRIGG, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

WEDNESDAY, January 21.

An engrossed bill authorizing the erection of certain light-houses, and the fixing of stakes, buoys, and beacons, at certain places therein named, was read the third time and passed.

A bill authorizing a grant of land for the use of a hospital at Natchez, allowing additional compensation to the judges of the Mississippi Territory, and extending the right of suffrage therein, was read the third time and passed—ayes 54, noes 31; and the title amended by striking out the words in italics.

Mr. TENNEY presented to the House a petition of sundry merchants and inhabitants of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, which was received, and read, praying that the duties due to the United States on certain goods, wares, and merchandise, consumed by fire in the said town of Portsmouth, on the 24th of December, 1806, may be remitted, and that the bonds given for securing the said duties may be cancelled; or such other relief afforded to them in the premises as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem reasonable and proper.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. J. RANDOLPH,

Ordered, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, this day, the petition of sundry merchants and inhabitants of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and, on motion of Mr. TENNEY, it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

BENEFIT OF DRAWBACK.

Mr. EARLY from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petition of Gideon Lamson, made the following report:

The ship Doris, of which the petitioner was owner, received on board, at Philadelphia, in the month of June last, a quantity of sugar and coffee, intended to be shipped to Antwerp, for the benefit of drawback. Before the whole of the intended cargo had been put on board, it was discovered that the vessel had made considerable waste, and the sugar and coffee she had received were relanded. The sugar was damaged seventy-five per cent., and by the exporter was thrown upon the hands of the owner of the ship. It does not appear that the misfortune arose from any want of care or attention. On the contrary, the vessel had, immediately before she began to receive her load, been examined by a person of competent skill, and pronounced free from defect.

The memorialist prays, upon these facts, that the debenture on the sugar may be allowed him, or that such other relief may be afforded, as Congress may consider just and proper.

The committee know of no principle heretofore recognised by Congress, which would authorize a compliance with this application. To allow the debenture when the sugar has not been exported from the United States, would be, in the highest degree, preposterous. To afford relief, in any way, would be to make the Government of the United States insurers against individual losses. The committee, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of Gideon Lamson ought not to be granted.

The report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be directed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation to the Governor, Judges, and Secretary, of the Indiana Territory, for extra services rendered by them in organizing the Government of Louisiana; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill for the relief of Edward Weld and Samuel Beebee; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. JEREMIAH MORROW,

Ordered, That the select committee to whom was referred, on the twelfth instant, a letter from Augustus B. Woodward, and others, appointed a committee by a convention of the inhabitants of the Territory of Michigan, held at Detroit, on the 26th day of November, transmitting an authenticated copy of the proceedings of the said convention, be discharged from the farther consideration thereof; and that the said letter and proceedings be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making a grant of land to certain refugees from the British Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia.

After considerable debate, the Committee reported the bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

THURSDAY, January 22.

Mr. JOHN RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. LEWIS presented to the House a petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, which was received and read, praying that an act may be passed to incorporate a company for the purpose of making a turnpike road from Bridgepoint, on Alexander's Island, opposite Maryland Avenue, to the north-eastern corner of the alms-house lot, and from thence, by a straight line, to the intersection of Washington and Montgomery streets, in the town of Alexandria; and for erecting a bridge over Four Mile Creek, upon such terms and under such restrictions as may be just and reasonable.—Referred to Mr. LEWIS, Mr. NICHOLAS R. MOORE, Mr. PORTER, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, to examine and report the same, with their opinion thereupon to the House.

On motion of Mr. DANA,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House copies of the accounts containing the respective charges which have been adjusted by the accounting officers of the Treasury, in cases of public prosecutions, before the Circuit Court of the United States, held in the district of Connecticut, in the months of April and September, in the year 1806.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed on the twelfth instant, presented a bill providing for the payment of the expense incurred by the military preparations for the defence of the Territory of Michigan against hostile Indians, in the year 1806, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the Circuit Court in the district of North Carolina," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the Circuit Court in the district of North Carolina," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee appointed "to inquire whether any, and if any, what, description of claims against the United States are barred by the statute of limitation, which, in reason and justice, ought to be provided for by law," made on the sixth instant; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating information touching an illegal combination of private individuals against the peace and safety of the Union, and a military expedition planned by them against the territories of a Power in amity with the United States, with the measures pursued for suppressing the same.

[For this Message, see Senate Debates of this date, ante, page 39.]

The Message was read, and, together with the documents transmitted therewith, referred to Mr. John Randolph, Mr. Boyle, Mr. Jeremiah Morrow, Mr. G. W. Campbell, Mr. Roger Nelson, Mr. Clinton, and Mr. Bidwell.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Edmund Briggs. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. Claiborne presented to the House a petition of the President and Trustees of the Alexandria Academy, in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, which was received and read, praying that all escheats, arising within the jurisdiction of the court of the county of Alexandria, and all specific fines imposed by law, and not otherwise appropriated, arising within the same jurisdiction, may be applied in aid and support of the said academy.—Referred to Mr. Claiborne, Mr. Holland, Mr. Taggart, Mr. Covington, and Mr. Bard, to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to extend the power of granting writs of injunctions to the Judges of the District Courts of the United States. The bill was reported with an amendment thereto, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the motion of the eighth instant, making provision for carrying into effect a treaty made between the United States and the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, on the third day of July, 1805.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare and bring in the same.

REFINED SUGAR.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on the memorials of the sugar refiners. It was read, as follows:

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petitions of Edward Pennington and others, of Philadelphia, and Charles Garts and others, of Baltimore, sugar refiners, submit their report:

The petitioners are manufacturers of sugar in the United States, and request that the sugar refined by them shall be allowed a drawback on the exportation. The subject has been often before Congress, and a lengthy and detailed report was made by the Committee to the second session of the Eighth Congress, to which the Committee beg leave to refer, and request it may be considered as part of this report.

The opinion of the Committee is opposed to granting any additional allowance or advantages to the sugar refiners, for the reasons stated in their former report; and they respectfully offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

The reading of the former report was then called for, and the Clerk having read the same, Mr. McCreery spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman—When the report which was last read was presented to the House, at a former session, it was referred to a Committee of the Whole, but, owing to a press of business, apparently of greater importance, it was not acted on. Notwithstanding that two lengthy reports have been made on this subject by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, and that I have generally stood alone in opposition to them, I must now presume to hope that a majority of this Committee, and among them the members of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, will ultimately agree to the desired modification of this branch of trade, when they come to understand the subject more perfectly, and shall be convinced that they have entirely mistaken the object of the petitioners. They neither ask nor desire any new duties or restrictions laid on the importation of refined sugars. They are willing, on the contrary, that the present duties on imported refined sugars, and on sugar candy, shall be made as low as Congress may deem necessary. All they ask is, that they may be allowed a reasonable drawback on the exportation of domestic refined sugar, made from foreign materials.

The objections urged in this report, are:

1st. That Louisiana sugar might be refined and exported.

2d. That imported sugar might be kept in store more than a year, and a drawback obtained afterwards.

3d. That the quantity of freight is diminished when the article is refined.

4th. That New England rum, cordage, canvass made into sails, and manufactured iron, are equally entitled to drawback, though not asked for.

As to the first and greatest objection, I answer that such an imposition is more easily guarded against than in any other species of goods, because we can have, besides the oath of the employer, that of the refiner also, and he is, in this, a disinterested person—but the quality of this sugar being much preferred for retail, renders this precaution less necessary—and besides these reasons, the public revenue can run no risk until a greater quantity of Louisiana sugar is furnished to us than is consumed in the United States. For example, suppose our home consumption amounts to fifty million pounds of sugar, which I believe it does, and the same quantity to be furnished us by Louisiana, which pays no duty; and suppose that an equal quantity of sugar of foreign growth be imported, and pays a duty of two and a half cents per lb., and that a drawback is allowed on exporting the same. This quantity of fifty millions will certainly be re-exported, because it cannot be consumed, and will obtain a drawback of the duties paid on entry—so that, in fact, the revenue gains nothing by the importation or exportation of this one hundred million of pounds, save three and a half per cent. on the debentures granted on the part exported. I would, therefore, ask what difference it can make to us which half is consumed, or which exported? Sir, it makes none, and I contend that the revenue can run no possible risk in this business until the quantity of sugar imported from Louisiana exceeds our whole consumption. At present, the quantity we receive from thence amounts to about four millions of pounds annually. When it shall exceed our consumption—an event which I shall be proud of—we shall have little difficulty in guarding against the imposition apprehended.

I have often seen, sir, that when subjects of this nature are discussed on this floor, the first question with many gentlemen is, how will this measure affect our revenue? I acknowledge that this consideration should never be lost sight of, but must at the same time avow that it has always been with me a secondary one. The first, in my estimation, is how will it affect the people? If the people shall gain ten times as much as the revenue loses by a measure, he must be a poor financier who cannot supply the loss in another shape. But, I am ready to assert that not only the people but the Government also will benefit by the desired alteration. During the period in which a drawback was allowed on the exportation of domestic refined sugar, the erection of refineries increased to such a degree that at present, being in a great measure confined to home consumption, most of them are idle half the year. The amount of that article exported last year, was short of 140,000 lbs., by which, no doubt the nation benefitted about $7,000, being 2½ cents per lb. on the quantity of crude sugar employed; but, sir, if the refiners be allowed a reasonable drawback, the quantity exported would in all probability soon amount to three million pounds or more annually, and, allowing only one cent per pound to be retained at the custom house, leaves a revenue of $30,000. In addition to this consideration, sir, let me add, that where a people is confined to the supplying of its own consumption of any article, the manufacture of the article must ever decline. I cannot better illustrate this proposition than by quoting the instance of the late policy of Great Britain towards Ireland. The latter nation was not only allowed the free exportation of linens, but in some cases a bounty, yet in woollens were restricted to their own consumption. Everybody knows that the manufacture of the one, although obliged to import their seed, flourished to an extraordinary degree; whereas in the other, although good wool was always abundant, declined; and they purchased their woollen cloths chiefly from England, and for this simple reason, that the dread of making too much and the surplus perishing, they dare not make enough for their own use. Observe the price of coffee in the United States, compared with any and every other country that imports and consumes it; we have it infinitely lower than any of them, because our merchants are not afraid of having more than can be consumed; knowing that they can readily obtain a drawback of duty on all they re-export. And it is owing to a defect of this regulation in the case of sugar, that the price of loaf sugar is at this time higher, compared with the price of crude sugar, than it was during the existence of the excise law, when a drawback was allowed on the exportation.

We have in some years exported from fifty to sixty millions of pounds of crude sugar. Could all this have been exported in a refined state, the revenue might have benefitted much, and the manufacturer still more. It would have brought much more in foreign countries, and enabled the exporters to import so much more of other goods, which would still have increased our revenue.

There is yet another advantage of great importance to be derived: belligerents have undertaken to say that our exportation of raw sugars was in many instances for account of their enemies; therefore, had these sugars been exported in a refined state, such allegations would not have been made.

The circumstance of merchants holding imported sugars in their warehouses for more than a year must occur so seldom, that I am astonished how it could be thought of as an objection. It may happen that sugar of a bad quality cannot be readily disposed of; but there can be no danger of refiners meddling with it.

The next objection is still more unfortunate, for in place of diminishing freight, it actually augments it—for take a cask of raw sugar, and refine it, I defy you to put the loaves made from it into the same volume; therefore, as it takes up more room and pays freight by measurement, while the crude sugar pays by weight, the ship owner is benefitted.

The argument that because a drawback is not allowed on rum, cordage, canvass, and iron, though not asked for, there ought not on sugar, is a curious one.

A drawback was allowed on rum when sugar was admitted to it; and why the distillers do not apply for it again, I know not. I do believe, though I am not certain of the fact, that a considerable part of what is commonly exported, goes to the coast of Africa; where it is not easy to procure the documents necessary to obtain the drawback. If a drawback on this article should hereafter be applied for, and it can be made appear that it is beneficial to commerce, I shall, for my part, have no objection to grant it.

The manufacturers of cordage will scarcely apply for an indulgence of this sort; the duty on imported hemp being only one cent per pound, and one pound of hemp making two pounds of tarred rope, renders the object too trifling.

To allow a drawback on imported canvass made into sails, would be attended with much difficulty, and must cause a deviation in some respects to rules laid down, and in practice at the custom-house.

The quantity of nails and spikes exported in one year is so small, that a reasonable drawback allowed on that article would amount to a very few thousand dollars, and will not, until the manufacture shall increase very much, be asked for.

However, sir, as the House is now very thin, and probably will not come to any decision on this measure until we have further information, I move you that the Committee now rise, in order that the petitions and report on this subject be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, that he may report thereon.

Mr. Early hoped the Committee would not rise for the purpose proposed; he was against any further reference of this business, on which so much time had already been spent, as it had been before the House for a number of years, and he did not think that any new light could be thrown on the subject.

The Committee rose, and leave being asked to sit again, it was resolved in the negative.

Mr. Early moved that the House concur with the resolution of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. Varnum spoke in favor of this motion, and the question being put, that the House do agree to the said report, it was carried in the affirmative.

Friday, January 23.

Mr. Aleton, from the committee appointed on the second instant, presented a bill making compensation to Messrs. Lewis and Clarke, and their companions; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. Varnum, the letter from William Eaton to the Speaker, together with the accounts and documents accompanying the same, presented to this House on the seventeenth of March last, were referred to the Committee of Claims.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the eighty-ninth section of the "act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and extending the provisions thereof to cases of seizure, under the laws relative to the navigation and commerce of the United States; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Edmund Briggs was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to extend the power of granting writs of injunctions to the Judges of the District Courts of the United States was read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee, on such parts of the Message of the President as relates to the fortifications of ports and harbors.

The resolutions reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Resolved, That a sum of money, not exceeding —— dollars, be appropriated to enable the President of the United States to cause our fortifications to be improved and repaired.

Resolved, That a further sum of money, not exceeding —— dollars, be appropriated to enable the President of the United States to cause to be built a number of gunboats, not exceeding ——, for the better protection of our ports, towns and rivers.

Mr. Mumford.—Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a motion to which I am impelled from the strongest conviction on my mind, that it is of primary importance to the peace, the honor, the safety, and the welfare of this nation, we should adopt some more efficient measures in defence of our own sea-coast. It is no doubt within the recollection of every member of this Committee, that in the month of April last, a most unwarrantable outrage was committed against the peace and dignity of the United States, within your own jurisdiction, by the commander of a certain British ship of war, called the Leander, who, in open contempt of your laws, and the violation of the laws of nations, did actually commit murder on one of your own citizens, within your own limits, near the port of New York, without provocation on his part, when in the lawful prosecution of his business.

However difficult it may be, notwithstanding our earnest desire to devise some more effectual means, which I hope will soon take place, to relieve a worthy class of our citizens from the cruel bondage and the lacerating whip of a man-of-war, is not this humiliation sufficient? Must we still be called upon to drink up the dregs? Will the United States submit to the humiliating degradation of having its own citizens murdered within its own limits, without making an effort and taking such strong ground as will prevent in future the repetition of the like crimes? No, sir, this nation will not submit to it. Sir, we have had insult added to injury, and notwithstanding the Cambrian frigate has been denied the rights of hospitality by the President's proclamation, in consequence of her participation in the murder of one of your citizens, yet a few days ago it appears another of your citizens has been seized by the commander of that frigate with force of arms, and threatened, at the peril of his life, that if he did not safely conduct that ship, contrary to the laws of his country, from Cape Henry into Hampton Roads, he would blow his brains out. She did arrive in Hampton Roads, and there replenished with a fresh supply of provisions, in order the more effectually to annoy your commerce, and add new insults to your citizens and to your Government.

I do not wish to excite alarm nor irritate this nation against any foreign Government on earth; my wish is to cultivate peace and friendship with them all on honorable terms. But I never will consent to do it at the expense of the honor, the safety, and the welfare of this nation. And I hope we shall, in justice to ourselves and the duty we owe our country, pursue such prompt and efficient measures as will more effectually protect our own sea shores. Impressed with these sentiments, and in order to prevent a repetition of the like offences in future, and to aid in carrying into execution the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated in April last, I beg leave to move the following amendment to the first resolution:

"And also to enable the President of the United States to equip, man, and maintain so much of the present naval force of the United States as he may judge proper.

Mr. Clinton.—I rise to second the motion of my honorable colleague. I am not in favor of expensive navies or standing armies. I am not certain whether, under existing circumstances, it is necessary to augment the former; but I am clearly of opinion that we should employ the force we possess in the defence of the country, and the protection of its lawful commerce. I well remember the sensation excited by the murder of Pierce. It was a glow of patriotic fire that pervaded the whole community; from Georgia to Maine it was felt like an electrical shock. Even the news of the death of Washington did not produce a more solemn effect. The want of a naval force was then severely felt, but there was no effectual power vested by the nation in the Executive to arm a single additional ship. Because we cannot meet the whole navy of Great Britain on the ocean, is it a reason that we should have no navy at all; that we should have no force of that kind to chastise marauders and pirates, and to protect our commerce and defend our ports? If we must have a navy—small as it is—let us employ it for its true design. If we have no need for a navy let us abandon it at once. I am willing to meet gentlemen on this ground. As to fortifications, it will be time enough to speak to that part of the resolution when it comes under debate.

Mr. R. Nelson said he did not know that he had any objection to the amendment; he had not made up his mind with regard to its propriety. He could wish, however, to see the blank in the first resolution in the first instance filled. If it should be filled up with a large sum, having an eye particularly to the defence of the port of New York, he should not be in favor of the amendment. He also thought the amendment would be, with more propriety, offered to the second resolution, as the first related solely to fortifications. He hoped the gentleman would inform the Committee with what sum he proposed filling the blank in the first resolution. Had it not been for the motion under consideration, Mr. N. said he should have moved to fill it with $20,000. He found that Congress had appropriated last year the sum of $150,000. From the letter of the Secretary of War, it would be seen that of this sum not more than $40,000 had been expended, and that the balance remained to be applied to the fortification of our ports and harbors. In conversation with the Secretary, Mr. N. said, the Secretary had informed him that this balance was as large a sum as could be advantageously laid out during the ensuing year; but that a sum of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars might be necessary as a contingent fund.

The Committee divided on the amendment offered by Mr. Mumford—yeas 46, nays 50.

Mr. R. Nelson moved to fill the blank in the first resolution with "$20,000."

Mr. Cook proposed "one million."

Mr. Mumford proposed "$500,000."

The motion to fill the blank with one million was disagreed to—yeas 12.

The motion to fill the blank with "$500,000" was then put.

Mr. Mumford.—However I may regret the loss of my amendment, I am conscious of the rectitude of my conduct, and having discharged my duty, I submit to the majority, in full confidence that we shall now pursue a magnanimous and liberal policy in the protection of our ports and harbors; and while I am disposed and willing, with a liberal hand, to extend the arm of national defence to our Western and Southwestern frontiers, I do hope the younger branches of the same family will not be unmindful of the good old thirteen United States. The importance of this subject, sir, strikes my mind in a very different point of view from some gentlemen. I consider it of serious consequence to the nation, both in relation to our foreign and domestic enemies. Sir, I do not know of any nation in the annals of history that ever neglected to protect their ports and harbors, especially when in a similar defenceless situation we now find our own. Their invariable system has been the defence of those cities which receive in deposit the productions of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures. Look to Constantinople, to the ports in Italy, to Cadiz, to Lisbon, to the whole coast of France, to Copenhagen, and to Great Britain. These nations, from time immemorial, have deemed it of primary importance to extend the arm of protection to all their ports and harbors. If the experience of ages has convinced them how essential it is to secure these places from the surprise of an enemy, however we may disapprove of their mode of Government, I do hope we shall approve and adopt their systems of defence, at least so far as they are applicable to our ports and harbors. What is the situation of our ports? Look at Charleston, South Carolina. I will take the liberty to read a communication from the Governor of that State to the Secretary of War, accompanying a Message from the President of the United States, dated February 3, 1806.

Executive Department,
South Carolina, February 3, 1806.

I herewith transmit, that it may be laid before the Executive of the United States, the copy of an act of the Legislature of this State, ceding various forts &c. to the United States. I feel it incumbent on me to state, that such is the situation of the forts in Charleston harbor, that the only gun which can at this moment be fired is a four pounder, the carriages of the heavy pieces that are mounted being so decayed as not to admit of the use of one of them; the walls, platforms, &c. are either in ruins or fast approaching that state, from the mere operation of the tides; and that this place is absolutely defenceless against any trivial force by sea.

The harbors of Beaufort and Georgetown are entirely without fortifications of any kind.

Under these circumstances, I console myself with the hope and expectation, that a speedy interference of the General Government will follow this act of cession. I beg leave to assure you, that I shall be happy to be aiding to the utmost, in effectuating the purposes contemplated therein, by any information or other means which may be in my power. I am, &c.

PAUL HAMILTON.

To the SECRETARY OF WAR.

Savannah, Wilmington, Norfolk, and many other ports in the United States, I believe, are not in a much better situation, even at this day.

What is the situation of the port I have the honor to represent? Sir, it is peculiar, from various circumstances. Nature has partly defended Savannah, Charleston, Wilmington, and Philadelphia, and many other ports in the United States, by sand bars, shoals, and rocks in their harbors and rivers. Not so with that port, only twenty-seven miles from the sea, almost in a direct line, carrying up twenty-four feet of water and no obstruction. In the Winter season, when the Delaware and the Potomac, and Patapsco, are frozen, the Hudson is open to the city of New York, no hindrance to the passage of ships of any burden. Thus we are exposed Winter and Summer to the insult of the first marauder that chooses to lay us under contribution. We do not expect the United States will construct fortifications similar to those of Gibraltar; but we do hope such measures will be pursued as to place all the ports and harbors of the nation in a respectable state of defence—that defence should be solid, durable, and proportionate to the end desired.

Can we take the responsibility on our own shoulders in neglecting to defend an exposed part of our country, wherein is centered, in so small a compass as the city of New York, upwards of ninety millions of property? Not only that city, but the whole Union would feel the shock. The States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, and the States adjoining the State of New York, are materially interested in the fate of that place; the amount of property deposited there from those States, chiefly the productions of our own soil, cannot be less than ten millions per annum. Sir, I should wish to know if the revenue of the United States deposited there is not an object worth defending? What would be the consequence, should that city be laid under contribution? Why, the bankruptcy of your merchants, and their total inability to pay your custom-house bonds, one being security for the other; and they all being plundered by the enemy, will render it impossible for them to pay, however anxiously they may be inclined to support that reputation which they consider coeval with their existence.

Do gentlemen expect the United States money would have an ear mark on it—"millions for defence, not a cent for tribute," and that it would receive a peculiar protection? No, sir, the enemy would make no distinction—money he must and would have.

Whatever may be the objections of some gentlemen to the wooden walls of a navy, and however we may differ on that point, on which I think there cannot be a dissenting voice—I mean the defence of our own shores, an inheritance purchased at the immense sacrifice of the blood and treasure of our ancestors; and I do hope we shall transmit it inviolate to the latest ages: I hope we shall ever be united in one sentiment, in the defence of our own shores. The present state of Europe and our own safety demand it of us, as a duty we owe to ourselves and to our country.

Sir, I contend we have a just claim on the General Government in common with the other States, for the protection of the port of New York; when we entered into the national compact, we surrendered in full confidence our peculiar local situation for the common defence, and to promote the general welfare of our country—not doubting in the least but that we should of course receive that protection we are justly entitled to, and I cannot but persuade myself, that when gentlemen take into view the magnitude of the object, they will vote a liberal appropriation, subject to Executive discretion. I am not only speaking the language of New York, but the constant language from Maine to Georgia.

This is not a new subject, sir; it has been the constant solicitude of the inhabitants not only of New York, but of these old thirteen United States for the last fifteen years of European war. They have relied on the assurances of peace repeatedly given them, and concurring in opinion that it was of consequence to redeem the national debt, they quietly, though with unfeigned anxiety, have waited the favorable moment when the finances of their country should become adequate to that end. The happy period having arrived, and strong in the consciousness of right, and in the sentiments of freedom, convinced that they have performed towards the Union all the duties of faithful citizens, they claim in return that great duty of all Governments, protection.

Mr. SMILIE.—I agree with the gentleman from New York, that if we could, we ought to render the ports and harbors of the United States, invulnerable to any enemy. But if nature forbids this, can we effect it? The gentleman informs us that our Treasury is overflowing, and that the happy moment has arrived for accomplishing this important object. But does not the gentleman see that to adopt the course he recommends would be to proceed blindfold in this business? If he really believes it practicable to fortify the port of New York against the attack of an enemy, and it is true that we possess the means of doing it, what ought to be our first step? Surely to appoint a qualified engineer to examine the harbor, and to decide whether its fortification be practicable, with instruction, if he thinks so, to report a plan, and an estimate of the sum required. This appears to me indispensably necessary before we make a grant of money. From what I have heard from the best judges, I am inclined to think that it is impossible to defend the harbors. At any rate I do not perceive any great reason for anxiety beyond that which has existed for several years. We are not at present threatened with war. On the contrary, the nation, of whose injuries we have had the greatest reason to complain, is in treaty with us, and manifests an amicable disposition towards us. I am, therefore, of opinion that there is no danger at present; and I consequently think it would be unwise to arrest the discharge of the national debt, and apply large funds to this object, without any evidence of its utility. I have no objection to go as far as the Government thinks proper in the building of gunboats. But I think a large appropriation for fortifications would at this moment be objectionable. I believe the whole revenue of the United States would prove inadequate. For these reasons I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. R. NELSON.—I cannot agree to fill the blank with so large a sum, and for this reason: We have been told by the Secretary of War, who must from his situation be considered as the best acquainted on this subject, that, although we should appropriate ten millions, the unexpended balance is as much as can be advantageously used during the ensuing year. This being the case, it is altogether unnecessary to inquire into the expediency or practicability of fortifying our ports and harbors from Maine to Georgia; as, if the thing were practicable, and we had the means, more than is already appropriated could not be advantageously expended. Let us for a moment examine the arguments of gentlemen. They have referred to the course pursued by other nations. They have told us that every other nation has fortified its ports and harbors, and has kept up great armies for its defence. What is the consequence? Their people are reduced to beggary and want. Rather than see the people of this country placed in the same calamitous condition, I would prefer beholding all the towns in the United States prostrate.

I recollect that in the year 1776 it was considered good policy to defend the city of New York. For this purpose troops were stationed on Long Island, on Staten Island, and on the island of New York. What was the consequence? The flower of our army was destroyed, without answering any valuable purpose.

Look at Charleston. It was also deemed politic to defend that city; and the whole Southern army was thrown into it. The whole army was either destroyed or made prisoners.

So it will be in all instances of a like kind, whenever we shall be engaged in a contest with a foreign Power, possessed of a large naval force; the garrison we may throw into a town will be destroyed. It becomes us, if we are wise, to pursue a different policy. When the enemy comes, let them take our towns, and let us retire into the country. There we can meet and defeat them. But if we waste our strength in an ineffectual attempt to defend our towns, after having lost our best troops, we shall be obliged at last to take refuge in the country.

Now, as to the port of New York, ten millions of dollars would not make it invulnerable to the attack of eight or ten ships-of-the-line. But suppose they did. Would not the enemy land their troops in the rear of the fortifications, and then where would be their utility? If we could oblige the enemy to come directly before our fortifications, they might be of some avail. But they will be too cunning to expose themselves unnecessarily to danger. It appears to me to be the most preposterous thing on earth to appropriate $500,000, when we are told that the sum of money already in the hands of the Government is as great as can be advantageously expended in the course of the present year.

Mr. CLINTON.—I do not rise to answer the arguments of the gentleman from Maryland, because I conceive them to be unanswerable. I can see no point in them. But I rise for information—to know of that gentleman whether he has received any estimate from the Secretary of War of the sum required to fill up the blank. If the Department of War be possessed of such information, and has formed the plans ascribed to it, I should wish them to be known, that the representatives of the people may not incur that responsibility which otherwise might be attached to them. I do not, however, mean by this intimation to express the least doubt of the good conduct of that department of the Government.

[The letter of the Secretary of War was here read, at the instance of Mr. CLINTON.]

Mr. COOK observed, that when a motion had been made for the increase of our small Navy, they had been told that we were a land animal, and ought to adopt measures for our defence on our own terra firma. He said he should not have risen on this occasion but for the monstrous doctrine avowed by the gentleman from Maryland. Are we, said he, when an enemy attacks our towns, like the Indians of our country, to burn our wigwams and fly for safety! Mr. C. said this appeared to him a perversion of the true principles of justice, economy, and policy. It appeared to him to be necessary to defend their seaports, in proportion to their magnitude and riches, and to the revenue derived from them. Now, it was a fact that nine-tenths of the whole revenue of the United States was collected in or near the towns. The House had recently repealed the act laying a duty on salt, the consequence of which was that the remaining duties fell the heavier on the seaport towns.

What will the nations of Europe think of us, said Mr. C. if we pursue this conduct? If we shall be involved in a war with either of them, what have they to do, but to send a few small schooners to attack our towns, under the assurance that we will make no resistance to their pillage and destruction? I hope this absurd sentiment is not entertained by many members. I hope the House will fill the blank with a liberal sum—with the sum of $500,000

Mr. MUMFORD.—Sir, I was well aware that the gentleman from Maryland would inform us what says the estimate from the Secretary of War. Although I have as much respect for that officer as any man, and have the fullest confidence in his integrity, economy, and distribution of the public money appropriated to that department, yet I presume he is not infallible. For my part, I differ essentially with him in relation to the defenceless situation of our seaboard from Maine to Georgia, which I consider as much exposed as the Western or Southwestern frontiers. When I have been called upon to vote supplies for those exposed parts of the Union, I have done it most cheerfully, presuming the same measure would be dealt out to all the vulnerable points of exposure in the nation. According to the doctrine of some gentlemen, it would appear that we soon shall have nothing to do but to assemble, and like the old Parliaments of France, enregister whatever edicts the heads of departments may please to present us. I am a plain republican, seeking neither office, nor courting popularity, firmly attached to the principles of freedom, and to what I conceive to be the true interest of my country. I shall exercise my own feeble judgment in pursuing such measures as I think may secure our common country against the inroads of foreign and domestic enemies; and, viewing the importance of more effectually defending our seashores (ports and harbors,) and considering it equal in importance to other vulnerable parts of the Union, especially in regard to our relations with Spain—for we cannot say how soon we may be called upon to defend our own firesides—I cannot, I will not, any longer bear on my shoulders the burden of that high responsibility. I do therefore hope the Committee will agree not to strike out.

Mr. TRACY.—There appears to be a very great difference of opinion in the minds of this Committee respecting the sum with which this blank ought to be filled. The sum of $10,000 and the sum of $1,000,000 have been mentioned. Between wise men, is it not extraordinary that such difference should be discovered! I wish the blank to be filled with $500,000. The gentleman from Maryland has informed us, that an application has been made of only a part of the appropriation of last session. This is one reason why I wish a large sum appropriated at this time. I feel confident the money will not be squandered away in a useless manner. It is, that the President may have the money at command, if it becomes necessary to make use of it; and if there is no reason for applying all the appropriation, the money will lie safe in the Treasury. Besides, I really yet hope some amendment will be made in the report, similar to the one proposed by my colleague, by which the President will be enabled to arm, equip, and keep in actual service, if necessary, all the gunboats and frigates. The circumstances of the nation are in many respects essentially altered since the last year, and at this important crisis we cannot exactly ascertain how great a sum will be necessary to meet the exigencies of the year ensuing. The gentleman from Maryland has very cautiously informed us, that the city of New York cannot be fortified, unless at an enormous expense, that the very attempt would be to set a trap for our own troops; therefore, if an enemy should come, it would be better to retreat into the country. In answer to the gentleman, I would inform him that we do not expect the United States to fortify New York with walls of brass and brazen gates, like Babylon. But the citizens of that important commercial city feel that they have a just right to claim from the Government some protection, some kind of fortifications, which will serve to obstruct the approach of a naval force for a time, that they may have at least a few hours to collect and carry with them their most valuable property in their flight. The property at this moment exposed is valued at more than one hundred millions of dollars. So great wealth was never before, by any nation, left unprotected. If the members of this House are determined to withhold the defence of the citizens, and of the property of the citizens of New York, merely as private property, then I call on them to defend their own property. Yes, Mr. Chairman, property of the United States to a great amount is exposed, and on the Representatives devolves the duty of making such appropriations as will enable the Executive to preserve the wealth and resources of the nation. The property of the United States in the city of New York is calculated from four to six millions. This amount of public property is exposed, for if the property of individuals, who owe the Government, is taken from them or destroyed, they cannot fulfil their engagements with the public. The very circumstance of leaving so much wealth in the defenceless situation in which we now find it, seems to invite aggression. It is a lure to any naval Power to attack us. The quantity of specie in the banks of New York and other seaport places, at all times, is an inducement to the freebooters of the ocean, of any nation, to fall upon such places, and lay them under contribution, or rifle the banks. I would call the attention of this Committee to the situation of New Orleans. Here we find the conspirators in our own country calculating upon the money in the banks to enable them to carry on the enterprise. Had they succeeded in seizing the bank of New Orleans, is it not probable that these same conspirators might have fitted out an armament sufficient to have laid New York under contribution? Considering the imminent danger of many of our seaports, in their defenceless situation, I sincerely hope the Committee will consent to fill the blank with $500,000.

The motion was disagreed to—38 to 65.

Mr. MUMFORD then moved to fill the blank with '400,000.'

This motion was disagreed to—37 to 66.

Mr. MUMFORD then proposed '300,000'—Disagreed to—ayes 36, noes 58.

Mr. COOK proposed '250,000.'

Mr. SMILIE said he sincerely wished the gentlemen would inform the House what kind of defence they desired. Last session a large sum had been appropriated for building gunboats. He still considered this species of defence the most consistent with their means; and that the money granted for the fortification of ports on the present plan would be so much money thrown away. He believed all they could do at present was to increase the number of gunboats.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with '250,000,' which was disagreed to—ayes 37, noes 69.

Mr. THOMAS said he rose to move that the blank be filled with one hundred thousand dollars, and he hoped the Committee would consent to fill it with that sum. He had not voted for the large appropriations which had been moved by several gentlemen, because he thought it was asking too much at this time; it was also unnecessary, because it was much more than could be expended to advantage, in one year; but he did hope that the Committee would agree to fill the blank with one hundred thousand dollars. He said the port of New York was, confessedly, the most important port in the Union, and it was by far the most vulnerable—it was therefore at this point, no doubt, the greatest part of any appropriation which should be made would be expended. It has been urged, as an objection to appropriating any considerable sum for this object at this time, that there is a large unexpended balance of the appropriations made at the last session; but the reason why a greater sum was not expended at that port, during the last summer, must be obvious to every one who had inquired into the subject. It was midsummer before the Secretary of War was able to complete a contract with an engineer and workmen, after which it was found necessary for the contractors to erect temporary buildings, which they were allowed to do on the public ground, for themselves and workmen to live in while they were at work; before this was done the greater part of the season was spent; but every thing is now ready to progress with permanent fortifications there, provided we afford the means. There is no question but that much more money will be expended to advantage, at that place, the next summer, than the unexpended balance of the former appropriation, if we authorize it, and he trusted we should—that the appropriation of this reasonable sum would not be refused. There have been, said he, several plans for defending that port, presented to the public, by sundry engineers, and which, he understood, were also submitted to the Executive, with estimates of the expense, some of which do not exceed $300,000. Provided we afford the means of progressing with works for the effectual defence of that port, there is no doubt but that the head of the War Department will adopt some of those plans, or form one from the whole, and proceed upon it, besides there can be no possible disadvantage resulting from an appropriation a little larger than would be expended in one year. We all know that the unexpended balance of any appropriation after a given period passes to the surplus fund, while on the other hand a real inconvenience may result from an appropriation too small; in this case the workmen must be discharged, perhaps in the middle of the season, everything stopped, and any contract, however advantageous, which may be entered into, given up.

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. T., we have heard great complaints, from citizens of the city of New York, on this subject, and we have heard, both out of doors and in the House, the present Congress charged with illiberality, and a want of due regard to the interests of the people of that city. I am far from joining in this charge—I think it an unjust one. I find, on examination, that the whole amount expended on fortifications, at that port, by the General Government, previous to the last session, was $100,025. Although we were threatened with a war in 1794-'95 by England, and were threatened, or were actually in a state of war with France in 1798-'99, notwithstanding this state of things, this sum was the whole that was allowed to put that port in a state of defence; while the present Congress, at the last session, did appropriate $150,000, the greater part of which was intended, and is in a train of expenditure, in fortifications, at that port. But, while I am willing to allow you full credit for the liberal appropriation made at the last session for this subject, I do hope and trust that you will continue to merit the same approbation, from all candid and impartial men, by filling this blank with one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLLAND said, he felt no hostility to New York, or any other city of the United States. He had, however, voted against filling the blanks with the sums that had been proposed, from the impression that they were not susceptible of fortification from the attacks which might be made from without. On this ground he was against going to any great expense for the fortification of this or any other port, and should therefore vote against the present motion.

Mr. N. WILLIAMS—When I look around me upon this floor and view the apathy and calm indifference that seems to pervade the Representatives of the nation, my heart is filled with the deepest apprehensions. From the course the business before us has taken, sir, I apprehend that we shall never rise into action, until roused by some dreadful disaster. Nor indeed do these fears appear to be without a foundation, when we have upon this subject, from various quarters of the House, such peculiar objections and extraordinary propositions. On the one hand, the gentleman from Maryland tells us of the expense of defending our seaports and towns; and proposes in order to avoid it, that we should retreat in case of danger, with our families and valuables, back into the tobacco fields and behind the mountains! While another on my right, tells us of the impossibility of erecting fortifications to defend New York; and tells us, also, that he will never consent to enter into measures of defence in time of peace. When we hear opinions and propositions like these, coming from sources so highly respectable, let me ask, whether there is not some cause for alarm? Would gentlemen consider seriously of the importance of the city of New York, with respect only to the wealth and commerce, and of its present exposure and defenceless situation, I am induced to believe, that this subject would not be treated so lightly. When the gentleman from Maryland speaks of the measures of the last session upon the subject of fortifications, he seems to have fallen into a very great mistake. He supposes that Congress intended, by granting the pitiful sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars towards fortifications, to adopt the plan of erecting new works. And then he observes, that the Secretary of War has not been able to expend more than one-third of the money appropriated; and infers that it will be folly to grant more money when it cannot be expended. It will be recollected, however, by all who were present, when the appropriation was made last year, that it was expressly avowed by the honorable chairman of the committee, (Mr. Dawson,) which reported the bill, that they had nothing but the reparation of old works, and to provide arms and ammunition for whatever place they might be wanted. This is probably the reason why no more of the money appropriated is not expended. On any other grounds it is to me unaccountable.

But, sir, it seems that whenever a plan of this kind is proposed in this House, we are to be met constantly with the cry of expense. And now, when the sum to be granted is whittled down to almost nothing, the same plea is presented to us, of expense. It appears from a report presented to this House by the Secretary of the Treasury, that after paying the sum of about $8,000,000, for the interest, and towards the principal of the national debt, and leaving an ample sum for the current expenses of the Government, we shall have not far from $2,000,000 in the Treasury at our disposal. Instead of devising new and extraordinary ways and means for getting rid of the public money, to me it would appear better, I confess, and more to the honor of the nation, to apply it in placing our cities and seaport towns in a state of safety—in defending them, at least from the assaults of the most insignificant squadrons that sail upon the ocean. Here, too, we are met by the gentleman on my right, (Mr. Smilie,) with a most formidable objection. Expend what you will, according to his opinion, it is impossible to erect fortifications that shall prove sufficient to defend the harbor and city of New York. He calls upon us for a plan, and tells us, that if it can be defended, to produce our plan. I do not pretend, sir, to be very wise upon this subject myself; but I have been told that the ablest engineers have examined the position, and have given it as their opinion that an effective mode of defence is practicable. But if defence is impossible, I call upon the gentleman to show wherein the peculiarity of the situation of that place consists, to render it so. For surely the pretence of impossibility would not be made use of here, unless the city and harbor of New York were different from all other places in the world that were ever defended. But have we no plan? I trust the gentleman who urges this against us, will call to mind, upon reflection, that a plan has been presented and laid upon his table—drawn up as we are told by a reputable citizen of New York—according to which, that city and harbor may be defended at an expense not to exceed $200,000. The truth is, that there seems to be an hostility against the adoption of any plan. Suppose, however, it should be conceded, that no plan can be devised, to render New York perfectly secure against the hostile assaults of an enemy, is it therefore, certain that nothing can be done to render the lives and property of its citizens more secure? Can nothing be done, better to enable some of the citizens to arrest the assaults of an enemy, while others with the women and children, and a few moveables, are running away to the mountains? There are two or three excellent regiments of artillery in the city of New York; these men would do their duty no doubt, in case of an assault—but, I ask, what they can be expected to do, without breastworks or batteries behind which to carry on repulsive operations? There is not a single battery or other work of defence on either side of the city; nothing to prevent ships of war from anchoring deliberately on either side, and firing upon the town and throwing in hot bombs for its destruction. If in works of this kind, we should expend two or three hundred thousand dollars, and thereby enable the citizens to arrest the progress of an attack, while they are securing their wives and children, and eight or ten millions of property, I should think the money well laid out. As it is, resistance would be vain.

The same honorable gentleman tells you, sir, that he does not see the cause of such anxiety at present, and has adopted this extraordinary language—that he will never consent to enter into measures of defence in time of peace. Why, sir, I always thought that a time of peace and prosperity, was the proper time to take measures of security against times of danger. We ought to be alarmed to hear such language from so respectable a statesman. It evinces to my mind that there is something rotten at bottom. I do not mean, sir, that there is anything corrupt; for the gentleman who uttered these sentiments is known to be an honorable and honest man. No one can respect him more than I do. What I mean is, that the principles he adopts on this occasion are without foundation, and coming from so respectable a source, they are attended with the more danger. Upon these principles, we are not to think of self-defence until the sword is lifted over our heads, and our country wrapt in flames. These principles will lead us to total inaction and degradation.

Again, the gentleman from Maryland tells us that projects of this kind will lead to slavery, beggary, and want, and calls upon us to look at the nations of Europe to verify the assertion. If the gentleman will prove to us that measures of this kind have produced that effect in foreign countries, or that they will produce it in this country, I will lift up both my hands against them. This is the first time that I ever heard, that to protect the commerce and commercial towns of a country, would reduce the people to a state of beggary and slavery. I believe most fully, that to leave commerce unprotected, and thus to suffer it to be destroyed, will be leading our citizens in a very direct road to inaction, and a state of abject meanness. But gentlemen from the South are under a very great mistake upon this subject. There is, let me tell them, a commercial spirit in this country that cannot be suffocated. Do what we may, it will be heard and felt. I did cherish a hope, sir, that something would at length be done, to enable the Government to lay a foundation for permanent fortifications. Low as the sum is now reduced for this purpose, still we find objections to it. If is this, which I think ought to arouse our feelings.

Gentlemen have alluded to a document from the War Department, to show that the money already appropriated for fortifications has not been expended. I shall always mention the head of that Department with great respect and deference. I have before explained the probable reason why that money has not been expended. The money was not granted for the erection of new works. Even this small sum of $100,000, added to the money unexpended of the former appropriation, will enable the Government to lay the foundation of an efficient plan of defence. Let it be once understood, that this is the wish of the nation, and I have no doubt it will be done. It is very possible, that if we determine to do nothing but patch up old works, the Government may find a difficulty in expending even the small sum we may appropriate. I did hope, sir, when my honorable colleague came forward with his proposition, that we should be able to obtain a larger sum; but since that seems now out of the question, I do still hope that the appropriation will not be suffered to dwindle into nothing.

Mr. Nelson said he did not mean to have troubled the House with any remarks on this point. But when he heard gentlemen talk on a subject which they did not understand, however well they might be acquainted with other subjects, he considered himself called upon to say something. He thought it very unlike a gentleman of the profession of the gentleman from New York to call upon them to prove a negative. This was a new doctrine. He thought it would be most regular for the gentleman himself to show the practicability of defending the port of New York. The onus probandi ought surely to fall on those who advocated this measure. Ay, but say the gentlemen, let us have a few batteries, for the purpose of throwing from them hot bombs. This thing, Mr. N. said, was entirely new to him, and was his reason for saying he thought the gentleman from New York did not understand the subject. He could not understand the expression hot bombs; and, indeed, the gentleman's knowledge on this point so surpassed his, that military men and engineers ought to apply to him for information.

But, says the gentleman, shall we not defend our ports and harbors? Mr. N. said he believed the fortifications would not be of use unless they were manned, as he had never heard of fortifications defending themselves. And what number of men would their defence require? A hundred thousand men would be incompetent to the task. What kind of men? The militia of the country, engaged at home in agricultural and other pursuits? No. It would be impossible to get these; and, if they could be procured, they would be incompetent to the duty. The defence of the works would require experience and peculiar knowledge. If, indeed, they undertook the fortifying all the ports and harbors of the United States, would a hundred thousand men be sufficient? If gentlemen thought so, they were egregiously mistaken. But is the House ready to raise a hundred thousand regulars? And is there any man bold enough to say, if they should, that such an establishment would not endanger the liberties of the nation, and be in the highest degree oppressive to the citizens of the United States? This is the application I wish to be made of the remarks I have offered, viz: that fortifications will be of no possible service unless they are manned, and to man them we must have a large standing army; and to know from the House whether they are prepared to adopt a system tha will require the raising of above a hundred thousand men?

Mr. N. Williams.—After the specimen the honorable gentleman from Maryland has given us of his military skill and prowess, in his proposed plan of flying to the mountains for defence, I shall never think of contending with him for superiority upon that subject. I would remind that gentleman, however, that before he undertakes to criticise upon the observations of others, it would be well for him to be very sure that he is correct himself. Perhaps, if he would take the pains to investigate a little, he would find that our bombs have generally a little fire in them, and consequently may chance to be rather hot.

He may likewise have in remembrance that we have none of us arrived to that sublime height of perfectability which some philosophers have supposed the human mind capable of attaining. We are yet wandering in the region of error. I forewarn that gentleman, therefore, not to act upon the idea that he has himself attained to perfection.

Mr. Cook moved to fill the blank with 200,000.

Mr. Stanton said, the idea that because fortifications could not do everything they could do nothing, was futile. He was for doing as much as could be done for the defence of the country. In support of his remarks, Mr. S. referred to a variety of instances on the page of history.

Mr. Cook said, he hoped before gentlemen rejected the motion under consideration, they would assign more satisfactory reasons than had as yet been adduced. We all, said Mr. C., profess to reverence the prowess and conduct of the late General Washington. Did he ever instruct the officers and soldiers under his command to abandon without a contest the cities to the enemy? And will any rational man say that measures, which even do no more than give time for the security of property, are not highly useful in time of war? I consider the people in the Atlantic States entitled to an equal defence with their Southern brethren on the frontiers, and to the expenditure of an equal sum of money for that purpose. How much had we expended for them? Fifteen millions have been appropriated on one occasion. Let me not be understood as applying to this measure the language of complaint. But I only adduce the circumstance to establish our claim, and I hope the gentlemen who represent that part of the United States which has been so abundantly defended, and at so great an expense, will be willing to accord to us that protection which our situation requires.

Mr. SOUTHARD said he considered the question before the Committee to be, whether the port of New York could be so fortified by land batteries as to annoy the enemy. Mr. S. said he was of opinion that it would be, at least so as to annoy any vessels that might attack the city for the purposes of insult or contribution. He was of this opinion from the little which he had seen in the year 1776. From the observation he had then made, he believed, if proper batteries were erected, it would be impossible for frigates or ships-of-the-line to burn or batter down the city. With regard to some remarks which had been thrown out, he had himself no idea that our citizens were to run away on receiving an attack from a few frigates. Neither was he of opinion that it would be proper to fortify all our towns. Gentlemen well knew that there were few ports in the United States that an enemy would consider it an object to attack. He, therefore, thought everything which had been said of the necessity of raising a hundred thousand men, and of enslaving the country, inapplicable to the subject under consideration. Mr. S. further said that he had no idea of an invading enemy. His only fear was from the insult and depredation of pirates, whom he was, therefore, anxious to be prepared to give a warm reception. For this purpose he did not believe it necessary to appropriate a large sum of money. He concluded by expressing a hope that the Committee would concur in making a moderate appropriation.

Mr. LYON advocated a liberal appropriation.

Mr. MACON (Speaker) observed that the arguments of gentlemen were almost entirely confined to the policy of defending the port of New York; whereas the measure under consideration was much broader, and extended generally to the protection of the ports and harbors of the United States. The only question then really before the Committee was, what sum was now requisite for this object. The chairman of the select committee, to whom this subject has been referred, proposed to fill the blank with $20,000. He has informed us, on the authority of the Department of War, that this sum, added to the unexpended balance appropriated last year, is as much as can be advantageously expended this year.

It appears to me, said Mr. M., that this is all gentlemen can require. No abstract question is involved in this measure, whether the port of New York is defensible, or whether we shall defend it. The second resolution contemplates the building of a number of gunboats. The remarks of gentlemen as to the defenceless state of our ports and harbors apply generally to the whole United States, unless they consider New York as more important than any other port. They labor under a great mistake when they consider the country as not equally interested in this question. Any injury that befalls the ports will necessarily affect the whole country where the produce that is taken to market is raised. The State he represented was as much interested as the State of New York, or any other State in the Union.

Mr. M. said he imagined by this time the people of the Western country thought they had fully paid the debt of fifteen millions—they had been so often told of it. He, however, was one of those who viewed the purchase of Louisiana as no local measure, or as being peculiarly beneficial to any one part of the Union. The navigating States were deeply interested in it, and so likewise were the Southern States in removing to a distance a dangerous neighbor. He had always considered it as a measure in which they were all concerned.

The Committee then divided as follows—on filling the blank with 200,000—yeas 42, nays 65; 100,000—yeas 51, nays 60; 50,000—yeas 38; 20,000—yeas 57, nays 42.

Mr. R. NELSON moved to fill the blank in the 2d resolution with '300,000.'

Mr. MUMFORD moved to fill it with '3,000.'

Mr. R. NELSON.—If gunboats are built, we ought to build enough to answer the purpose intended. The proper department has informed us that $300,000 will be necessary for that purpose. For myself, I am wholly ignorant of the utility of gunboats, but, from information received from those who ought to understand the subject, I believe they are the best species of defence. They are constructed so as to operate in shallow water, where frigates and larger vessels cannot come. I believe they are the natural mode of defending our ports so far as they are capable of any defence. But I am really astonished at the motion of the gentleman from New York (Mr. MUMFORD.) Just now he was for granting a million towards the defence of our harbors, and now he thinks $3,000 are quite enough. I leave it to him to reconcile his opinions.

Mr. MUMFORD.—Gunboats may answer in rivers and in the Southern States, where the water is shallow; but they are inadequate to any useful purpose of defence in the Northern States, where the waters are rough.

Mr. COOK was in favor of gunboats, though he thought they ought not to be the exclusive means of defence.

The motion to insert 300,000 was lost—yeas 36, nays 46.

Mr. THOMAS moved to insert 250,000. That sum would build fifty gunboats.

The motion was agreed to—yeas 53, nays 33.

Mr. R. NELSON then proposed to fill the second blank with fifty. Had the House agreed to fill the first blank with 300,000, he should have proposed sixty for the second blank.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS hoped the Committee would not agree to this motion, and for this reason: the sum of $250,000, would not be sufficient to build fifty gunboats. Look at the documents on the table, and you will see, said Mr. W., that the lowest sum expended on the building of a gunboat exceeds $10,000.

Mr. R. NELSON said he did not understand the reasoning of the gentleman from South Carolina. It appeared to him demonstrable that if $300,000 would build sixty gunboats, $250,000 would build fifty. This was all that was required by the gentleman at the head of the Navy Department, and he believed these gentlemen were not in the habit of asking too little.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS said he had only risen to warn the House against a surprise. They had better documents than this estimate of the Secretary of the Navy. By his reports it would be seen that there had not been a single gunboat built for less than $10,000.

Mr. COOK observed that it appeared, from the most correct information, that some of the gunboats could be built for $5,000.

The motion to fill the blank with "fifty," was then agreed to—yeas 53, nays 32.

Mr. R. NELSON then offered an amendment to the following effect:

"That the sum of —— dollars be appropriated to authorize the President to arm, man, and equip such a number of gunboats as he may think the public service requires."

The amendment was agreed to without a division.

Mr. THOMAS offered an additional resolution, authorizing and requesting the President to cause measures to be taken to ascertain how the port of New York may be best protected, and to obtain an estimate thereof.

This motion was objected to by Messrs. SMILIE, HOLLAND, and LLOYD, principally on the ground that if any such inquiry were made, it ought to be extended so as to apply to the other ports of the United States, and was negatived—yeas 39, nays 46.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill.

Mr. VAN CORTLANDT moved an amendment to the addition to the second section, introduced at the instance of Mr. R. NELSON, authorizing the President at any time to man and equip such of the other armed vessels as he may deem proper.

Messrs. VAN CORTLANDT, ELMER, MUMFORD, and COOK, supported; and Messrs. FISK and BURWELL opposed this amendment.

When on motion of Mr. SOUTHARD the further consideration of the subject was postponed till Monday, to which day the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 26.

Another new member, to wit: WILLIAM W. BIBB, from Georgia, returned to serve as a member for the said State, in the place of Thomas Spalding, who hath resigned his seat, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Seth Harding, late a captain in the navy of the United States;" and also a bill, entitled "An act establishing circuit courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts in the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio;" to which they severally desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the committee appointed on the second instant, presented a bill prescribing the effect of records of judgments and decrees of courts of one State in another State; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, enclosing an affidavit of General Wilkinson, charging Messrs Samuel Swartwout, Peter V. Ogden, and James Alexander, with being concerned in a conspiracy.

The Message amd affidavit were read, when Mr. THOMAS inquired if the documents alluded to therein did not accompany them, and received for answer that there were no further documents transmitted to the House.

SUSPENSION OF THE HABEAS CORPUS.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am directed by the Senate of the United States to deliver to this House a confidential message, in writing.

The House being cleared of all persons except the members and the Clerk, Mr. SMITH delivered to the SPEAKER the following communication in writing:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The Senate have passed a bill suspending for three months the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in certain cases, which they think expedient to communicate to you in confidence, and to request your concurrence therein, as speedily as the emergency of the case shall in your judgment require.

Mr. SMITH, also delivered in the bill referred to in the said communication, and then withdrew.

The bill was read as follows:

A Bill suspending the writ of Habeas Corpus for three months, in certain cases.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That in all cases, where any person or persons, charged on oath with treason, misprision of treason, or other high crime or misdemeanor, endangering the peace, safety, or neutrality of the United States, have been or shall be arrested or imprisoned, by virtue of any warrant or authority of the President of the United States, or from the Chief Executive Magistrate of any State or Territorial Government, or from any person acting under the direction or authority of the President of the United States, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall be, and the same hereby is suspended, for and during the term of three months from and after the passage of this act, and no longer.

Mr. P. R. THOMPSON moved that the message and the bill received from the Senate ought not to be kept secret, and that the doors be opened.

Mr. BURWELL and Mr. SMILIE spoke in support of the motion.

Mr. EARLY thought that a previous order should be taken to remove the injunction of secrecy. To open the doors and admit strangers to hear the debate, and yet continue the injunction of secrecy on members would present a singular spectacle.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said they could not be bound to secrecy except by their own vote. If there was any charm by which they could be bound, except their own act, he wished it might be dissolved.

Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL hoped the usual course would be pursued; read the bill a second time, and then refer it to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALSTON thought the question, whether the bill should pass to a second reading, first in order.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion to open the doors was in order, and the question on that motion must first be taken.

The yeas and nays being demanded by one fifth of the members present, they were ordered to be taken.

The question then was put on the motion, That the message and bill received from the Senate ought not to be kept secret, and that the doors be now opened; and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 3,

Mr. EPPES moved that the bill be rejected. This motion was afterwards withdrawn to give place to another motion, but with the idea of renewing it again.

Mr. BURWELL said, he was unacquainted with the particular reasons which had induced the Senate to pass this bill. None had been assigned when the bill was communicated, and no additional documents presented. He could, therefore, only be governed by that information which the House had received; and he believed that it would justify the motion before the House. The President, in his Message of the 22d, says, "on the 'whole the fugitives from Ohio and their asso-'ciates from Cumberland, or other places in that 'quarter, cannot threaten serious danger to the 'city of New Orleans." If that be the case, upon what ground shall we suspend the writ of habeas corpus? Can any person imagine the United States are in danger, after this declaration of the President, who unquestionably possesses more correct information than any other person can be supposed to have. In another part of the Message, we are informed—

"That the persons arrested at New Orleans have been embarked for some of the Atlantic ports, probably on the consideration that an impartial trial could not be expected during the present agitations of New Orleans, and that that city was not as yet a safe place of confinement. As soon as these persons shall arrive, they will be delivered to the custody of the law, and left to such course of trial, both as to place and process, as its functionaries may direct; the presence of the highest judicial authorities to be assembled at this place within a few days, the means of pursuing a sounder course of proceedings here than elsewhere, and the Executive means, should the judges have occasion to use them, render it equally desirable, for the criminals as for the public, that being already removed from the place where they were apprehended, the first regular arrest should take place here, and the course of proceedings receive here its proper direction."

The President evidently holds out the idea, that the correct and proper mode of proceeding can be had under the existing laws of the United States. These persons may be transferred from the military to the civil authority, and be proceeded against according to law. Those, therefore, who fear the escape of the traitors already apprehended, and would, by this measure, obviate the difficulty, must perceive that consequence would not ensue. Mr. B. said, he should consider the suspension of the habeas corpus as holding out an idea of danger and alarm, which was highly improper, inasmuch as it did not exist. It is true, this conspiracy was once formidable, extensive, and threatening; but it has been dissipated by the vigilance of Government. He would ask gentlemen, if they seriously believed the danger sufficiently great to justify the suspension of this most important right of the citizen, to proclaim the country in peril, and to adopt a measure so pregnant with mischief, by which the innocent and guilty will be involved in one common destruction? He said this was not the first instance of the kind since the formation of the Federal Government; there had been already two insurrections in the United States, both of which had defied the authority of Congress, and menaced the Union with dissolution. Notwithstanding one of them justified the calling out of fifteen thousand men, and the expenditure of one million of dollars, he had not heard of a proposition to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. What, then, will be said of us, if now, when the danger is over, firm in the attachment of the people to the Union, with ample resources to encounter any difficulties which may occur, we resort to a measure so harsh in its nature, oppressive in its operation, and ruinous as a precedent? While, in former times, it was thought unsafe to suspend this most important and valuable part of the Constitution, he would ask, whether the necessity at the present time could be considered greater? With regard to those persons who may be implicated in the conspiracy, if the writ of habeas corpus be not suspended, what will be the consequence? When apprehended, they will be brought before a court of justice, who will decide whether there is any evidence that will justify their commitment for farther prosecution. From the communication of the Executive, it appeared there was sufficient evidence to authorize their commitment. Several months would elapse before their final trial, which would give time to collect evidence, and if this shall be sufficient, they will not fail to receive the punishment merited by their crimes, and inflicted by the laws of their country.

Mr. B. said, he could conceive no injury that would result on this score; and, indeed, if some persons should elude justice, it would not endanger society so materially as to come within the terms of the Constitution. He observed, it appeared to him the commencement of an insurrection was the only time when the writ of habeas corpus ought to be suspended; when the seizure of the ringleaders, by dismaying the inferior agents, would enable the Government, without the effusion of blood, to suppress it. But it was manifest that, at this moment, everything intended by the conspirators was effected, or they were in the hands of the civil authority; there was, therefore, no good reason to take this precautionary step with that view; while, on the one hand, it would unavoidably produce unnecessary alarm, and much inconvenience to the citizens of the United States. Nothing but the most imperious necessity would excuse us in confining to the Executive, or any person under him, the power of seizing and confining a citizen, upon bare suspicion, for three months, without responsibility, for the abuse of such unlimited discretion. Mr. B. said, he could judge from what he had already seen, that men, who are perfectly innocent, would be doomed to feel the severity of confinement, and undergo the infamy of the dungeon. What reparation can be made to those who shall thus suffer? The people of the United States would have just reason to reproach their representatives with wantonly sacrificing their dearest interests, when, from the facts presented to this House, it seems the country was perfectly safe, and the conspiracy nearly annihilated. Under these circumstances, there can be no apology for suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and violating the Constitution, which declares "the writ of ha-'beas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, 'in cases of invasion or rebellion, the public safety 'may require it."

Mr. B. said he hoped he had shown that, admitting the two cases specified in the Constitution existed, they were not accompanied with such symptoms of calamity as rendered the passage of the bill expedient.

What, in another point of light, would be the effect of passing such a law? Would it not establish a dangerous precedent? A corrupt and vicious Administration, under the sanction and example of this law, might harass and destroy the best men of the country. It would only be necessary to excite artificial commotions, circulate exaggerated rumors of danger, and then follows the repetition of this law, by which every obnoxious person, however honest, is surrendered to the vindictive resentment of the Government. It will not be a sufficient answer, that this power will not be abused by the President of the United States. He, Mr. B. believed, would not abuse it, but it would be impossible to restrain all those who are under him. Besides, he would not consent to advocate a principle, bad, in itself, because it will not, probably, be abused. For these reasons, Mr. B. said, he should vote to reject the bill.

Mr. ELLIOT said, that he regretted the motion to reject the bill had been made, because, considering the subject of very great importance, he thought it most proper that it should take the usual course of business, that the bill should be read a second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole, for the purposes of deliberation and discussion.

Called upon, however, said Mr. E., to answer to the question, Shall the bill be rejected? I must answer that question in the affirmative, as I should deem it my duty to advocate its rejection, in any form which it might assume, and in any stage of its progress; and I deem it equally my duty, on the present occasion, to express my sentiments upon the subject. It is, indeed, difficult for me, consistently, with the sincere and high respect which I entertain for the source from whence this measure originated, to express, in decorous terms, the hostility which I feel to the proposition. I am therefore disposed to consider it as an original proposition here; as a motion in this body to suspend, for a limited time, the privileges attached to the writ of habeas corpus. And, in this point of view, I am prepared to say that it is the most extraordinary proposition that has ever been presented for our consideration and adoption. Sir, what is the language of our Constitution upon this subject? "The privilege of the writ of ha-'beas corpus shall not be suspended, except when, 'in cases of invasion or rebellion, the public safety shall require it." Have we a right to suspend it in any and every case of invasion and rebellion? So far from it, that we are under a Constitutional interdiction to act, unless the existing invasion or rebellion, in our sober judgment, threatens the first principles of the national compact, and the Constitution itself. In other words, we can only act, in this case, with a view to national self-preservation. We can suspend the writ of habeas corpus only in a case of extreme emergency; that alone is salus populi which will justify this lex supreme. And is this a crisis of such awful moment? Is it necessary, at this time, to constitute a dictatorship, to save the people from themselves, and to take care that the Republic shall receive no detriment? What is the proposition? To create a single Dictator, as in ancient Rome, in whom all power shall be vested for a time? No; to create one great Dictator, and a multitude, an army of subaltern and petty despots; to invest, not only the President of the United States, but the Governors of States and Territories, and, indeed, all persons deriving civil or military authority from the supreme Executive, with unlimited and irresponsible power over the personal liberty of your citizens. Is this one of those great crises that require a suspension, a temporary prostration of the Constitution itself? Does the stately superstructure of our Republic thus tremble to its centre, and totter towards its fall? Common sense must give a negative answer to these questions. What are the facts? Is it, indeed, a case of rebellion? We are officially informed that rebellion has reared its hydra front in the peaceful valleys of the West. But we are also informed by the Executive that treason has no prospect of success; that "the fugitives from the Ohio, and 'their associates from Cumberland, cannot threat-'en serious danger even to the city of New Or-'leans." Not a single city, still less a Territory or a State, is considered in danger; and the Executive, not only possesses all the information which has been communicated to us, but much more, for we are informed that the communication has been made under the reservation contained in the resolution requesting it, and of course all the facts in the knowledge of the Executive, which are decided to be improper for disclosure at this time, have been kept back. And the Executive, possessing all this information, assures us that the public safety is not endangered. Can we, under these circumstances, consent to the investiture of dictatorial powers in that department of the Government which thus assures us that all is safe? It would be contrary to the spirit of the Constitution.

But we shall be told that the Constitution has contemplated cases of this kind, and, in reference to them, invested us with unlimited discretion. When any gentleman shall advance such a position, we, who advocate the rejection of the bill, will meet him upon that ground, and put the point at issue. We contend that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated the exercise of such a power, under circumstances like the present; and that the Constitution itself, instead of authorizing, has prohibited such discretion, unless in an extreme case. And can any member lay his hand upon his heart and say, that the present is a case of that description? He who cannot do this must, with us, consider the proposed measure as unconstitutional.

Let us pay a little attention to the nature and character of the writ of habeas corpus. It has its origin in Great Britain, and is there considered in two great points of view, as it respects the Monarch, and as it respects the subject. As it respects the Monarch, it is one of the jura prerogativa, a writ of prerogative; but it is not considered as calculated to increase the power of the King, or the splendor of the throne; in its origin and true character it is viewed as a prerogative, exercised by the King, or those authorities to whom his judicial powers are supposed to be delegated, only for the purpose of securing the Constitutional rights of the subject, and restraining the invasion of those rights. As it respects the subject, it is a writ of right, and is emphatically called, by English writers, a writ of liberty.

By the provisions of the famous statute of Charles II., which has even been called a second magna charta, its privileges are guarantied to all British subjects at all times. An eminent English author, and the most popular writer upon subjects of legal science, considers its suspension as the suspension of liberty itself; declares that the measure ought never to be resorted to but in cases of extreme emergency; and says that the nation then parts with its freedom for a short and limited time, only to resume and secure it forever. Hence, he compares the suspension of the habeas corpus act in Great Britain to the dictatorship of the Roman Republic.

But objectionable as the bill upon the table is in point of principle, it is, if possible, still more objectionable in point of detail. It invests with the power of violating the first principles of civil and political liberty, not only the supreme Executive, and the Executives of individual States and Territories, but all civil and military officers who may derive any authority whatever from the Chief Magistrate. And it extends the operation of the suspension of the privileges of the habeas corpus, not only to persons guilty or suspected of treason, or misprision of treason, but, to those who may be accused of any other crime or misdemeanor, tending to endanger the "peace, safety, or neutrality," of the United States! What a vast and almost illimitable field of power is here opened, in which Executive discretion may wander at large and uncontrolled! A vast and dangerous scene of power, indeed! It gives the power of dispensing with the ordinary operation of the laws to a host of those little great men, who are attached to every Government under heaven. I wish not to reflect upon any of those subordinate officers who may be employed by the Government of my country.

But no one will doubt that, in times of alarm and danger, many men will be clothed with the functions of office, who are incompetent to the discreet exercise of such boundless discretion. I can never wish to see such persons invested with the means of aiming at the heads of their private enemies, or other innocent and unoffending citizens, the thunderbolts of public indignation, or scorching them with the lightning of public suspicion—says the poet:

"Could great men thunder, Jove would ne'er be quiet,
For every petty pelting officer
Would use his heaven for thunder."

Let us again ask for evidence of the necessity of this measure? Certainly none can be produced, for we are informed, from the first authority, that if the present be not a time of profound peace, it is far from being a period of public danger. The leader of this petty rebellion has been called the modern Catiline. Undoubtedly, he possesses many of the qualities which a celebrated ancient historian ascribes to the Catiline of Rome: his genius, his address, his activity, his profligacy; but he is destitute of his means and resources. He wants that power of doing mischief, which the Roman conspirator possessed. So far is he from being able to make war upon his country, that he cannot take possession of a single city. He is rapidly hastening to the same fate, although he may not meet it in the same manner. Already is he "damn'd to everlasting fame," or rather, damned to everlasting infamy. Already is he a fugitive. Already a price is set upon his head. In the papers of this morning, we see that the Governor of Orleans has offered a reward for his apprehension. We cannot but detest the traitor, but we can have no fears of the consequences of the treason.

Mr. E. concluded, by expressing a hope that the bill would meet a decided vote of rejection.

Mr. EPPES.—When I feel a decided hostility to a principle, it is not material to me in what form I meet it. Decidedly opposed to the principle of this bill, I shall vote against it in all its stages, and cannot but hope that the motion of my colleague to reject it will prevail. By this bill, we are called upon to exercise one of the most important powers vested in Congress by the Constitution of the United States. A power which suspends the personal rights of your citizens, which places their liberty wholly under the will, not of the Executive Magistrate only, but of his inferior officers. Of the importance of this power, of the caution which ought to be employed in its exercise, the words of the Constitution afford irresistible evidence. The words of the Constitution are: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus 'shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of 'rebellion or invasion, the public safety may re-'quire it." The wording of this clause of the Constitution deserves peculiar attention. It is not in every case of invasion, nor in every case of rebellion, that the exercise of this power by Congress can be justified under the words of the Constitution. The words of the Constitution confine the exercise of this power exclusively to cases of rebellion or invasion, where the public safety requires it. In carrying into effect most of the important powers of Congress, something is left for the exercise of its discretion. We raise armies when, in our opinion, armies are necessary. We may call forth the militia to suppress insurrection or repel invasion, when we consider this measure necessary. But we can only suspend the privilege of the habeas corpus, "when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety requires it." Well, indeed, may this caution have been used as to the exercise of this important power. It is in a free country the most tremendous power which can be placed in the hands of a legislative body. It suspends, at once, the chartered rights of the community, and places even those who pass the act under military despotism. The Constitution, however, having vested this power in Congress, and a branch of the Legislature having thought its exercise necessary, it remains for us to inquire whether the present situation of our country authorizes, on our part, a resort to this extraordinary measure.

The inquiry is confined within very narrow limits. The power can only be exercised under the Constitution, "when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." Our country is not invaded. We have only, therefore, to inquire whether there exists in this country a rebellion, and whether the public safety requires a suspension of the habeas corpus. Of the existence of the rebellion or combination against the authority of the United States there can be no doubt, as we have on our table a detailed account of its origin and progress. I shall confine my observations solely to the latter part; whether the public safety requires a suspension of the habeas corpus for its suppression. In the communication now on our table, from the Executive, we have been informed that the militia of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and of the Mississippi and Orleans Territories, have been ordered out. That General Wilkinson was at Orleans, on the 10th of December, with his troops from the Sabine, which from other information we know to consist of one thousand effective men. These are resources of the nation now in active operation. What is the force of the conspirators? By the same documents, we are informed that "some boats, ac-'counts vary from five to double or treble that num-'ber, and persons, differently estimated from one to 'three hundred, had passed the falls of the Ohio to 'rendezvous at the mouth of Cumberland river, 'with others expected down that river." From the same document it appears that the force which comes down Cumberland river amounts to two boats, in one of which is Aaron Burr. From this statement, it appears that the largest calculation as to the actual force of the conspirators, is three hundred, But when we know the propensity of human nature to magnify accounts of this kind, we may fairly infer that the whole force does not exceed one hundred and fifty men. To oppose which, we have one thousand regular troops, and the militia of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and of the Mississippi and Orleans Territories. Is there a man present who believes, on this statement, that the public safety requires a suspension of the habeas corpus? This Government has now been in operation thirty years; during this whole period, our political charter, whatever it may have sustained, has never been suspended. Never, under this Government, has personal liberty been held at the will of a single individual. Shall we, in the full tide of prosperity, possessed of the confidence of the nation, with a revenue of fifteen millions of dollars, and six hundred thousand freemen, able and ready to bear arms in defence of their country, believe its safety endangered by a collection of men which the militia of any one county in our country would be amply sufficient to subdue? Shall we, sir, suspend the chartered rights of the community for the suppression of a few desperadoes; of a small banditti already surrounded by your troops; pressed from above by your militia; met below by your regulars, and without a chance of escape, but by abandoning their boats, and seeking safety in the woods? I consider the means at present in operation amply sufficient for the suppression of this combination. If additional means were necessary, I should be willing to vote as many additional bayonets as shall be necessary for every traitor. I cannot, however bring myself to believe that this country is placed in such a dreadful situation as to authorize me to suspend the personal rights of the citizen, and to give him, in lieu of a free Constitution, the Executive will for his charter. I consider the provision in the Constitution for suspending the habeas corpus as designed only for occasions of great national danger. Like the power of creating a Dictator in ancient Rome, it prostrates the rights of your citizens and endangers public liberty. Like that it may, on some very extraordinary occasions, prove salutary, but like that, it ought never to be resorted to, but in cases of absolute necessity; or, to use the emphatic language of the Constitution, "when the public safety requires it." Believing that the public safety is not endangered, and that the discussion of this question is calculated to alarm the public mind at a time when no real danger exists, I shall vote for the rejection of the bill in its present stage.

Mr. VARNUM said, if he was of opinion with the gentlemen from Vermont and Virginia, he should vote for the rejection of this bill; but he entertained a different opinion, and, unless he heard something to change it, he should vote differently from them. He did not believe the Constitution restricted the power of the Government to suspend the privilege of the habeas corpus in cases where the country was shaken to its centre. There were no expressions in it to justify this inference. Its terms are: 'The privilege of the 'writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except when, in cases of invasion or rebellion, the public safety shall require it." Will gentlemen deny that there exists in the United States at present a rebellion? I presume not, said Mr. V., it is too notorious to admit of doubt. Will they deny that the conspiracy has been formed with deliberation, and has existed for a long time? Is it not evident that it has become very extensive? If, then, this is the case, and the head of the conspiracy has said that he is aided by a foreign Power; if this is true, are we justified in considering the country in a perfect state of safety, until it is brought to a close? I conceive not. I consider the country, in a degree, in a state of insecurity; and if so, the power is vested in the Congress of the United States, under the Constitution, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. I am also apprehensive that we shall not be able to trace the conspiracy to its source without such a suspension. We have had an instance in which the head of the conspiracy has been brought before a court of justice, and where nothing has been brought against him. It is not my wish to insinuate that any court or public functionary is contemplated by this conspiracy; yet it is possible that this may be the case, and the very existence of the country may depend on tracing it to its source. I am not disposed to advocate sanguinary punishments, but I think they ought to be exemplary in regard to the chiefs of the conspiracy; for which purpose we ought to adopt those measures which will lead to a full discovery of those concerned in it. I am sensible that the Government of the United States has not hitherto resorted to this measure; but I know a particular State of the Union who did consider the measure necessary, in the case of an insurrection which occurred within her limits; and I think it very doubtful whether that insurrection would have so happily closed, if it had not been for her suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Have we had any insurrection or rebellion in the United States like this? We have had one insurrection in Massachusetts, but whence did it arise? Not from a design to subvert the Government, but from the burden of taxes; taxes which, perhaps, exceeded those laid in any country since the formation of society. I do not mean, by these observations, by any means to justify that insurrection, and, I believe, from the circumstances with which I am acquainted, that the insurrection which took place in Pennsylvania did not go to the subversion of the Government. But let us look at this conspiracy. While the nation, from one extreme to the other, enjoys a degree of prosperity and happiness unparalleled in any other nation, and not a single individual within our limits has any reason to complain of oppression, an insurrection is fomented, subversive of the Government and destructive of the rights of the people. It appears to me that this insurrection is the most aggravating of all insurrections which history gives us an account of. There is not the least oppression or the least pressure of circumstances to induce any individual to rise up against the Government of this country; and it consequently betrays the greatest turpitude of mind in those who either lead or unite in it. For these reasons, I think it ought to be traced to its source, and I think it very doubtful whether this can be effected without, in the first instance, suspending the habeas corpus. Will gentlemen say that any innocent man will have a finger laid upon him, should this law pass? No; there is no probability of it; it is scarcely possible. But, even if it be possible, if the public good requires the suspension of the privilege, every man attached to the Government and to the liberty he enjoys, will be surely willing to submit to this inconvenience for a time, in order to secure the public happiness. The suspension only applies to particular crimes, the liberties of the people will not therefore be touched. I do think a great responsibility will rest on this branch of the Legislature, in case they refuse to pass this act. Suppose the head of this conspiracy shall be taken in a district of country where no evidence exists of the crime charged to him, and he shall consequently be set at liberty by the tribunals of justice; where will the responsibility rest, but upon this branch of the Legislature?

It is too great for me, as an individual member, to bear. I shall, therefore, vote for this bill, under the impression that it will not have the injurious effects that some gentlemen seem to apprehend; and that it will only more effectually consign the guilty into the hands of justice.

Mr. R. NELSON.—As the motion to reject the bill meets my most hearty approbation, and as I consider it involving a great national question, I cannot reconcile it to my duty to give a silent vote on it. I shall, however, in order to avoid an unnecessary consumption of the time of the House, offer my remarks in as concise a compass as possible. I shall first consider the nature of the writ of habeas corpus; afterwards examine its effects, not only on the individual, but on the community at large; taking into view the mode of proceeding under it, to show, as I conceive, that no danger can ensue, on the refusal to pass this bill.

What is a writ of habeas corpus? It is a writ directing a certain person in custody to be brought before a tribunal of justice, to inquire into the legality of his confinement. If the judge is of opinion that the confinement is illegal, the person will of course be discharged; if, on the contrary, from the evidence, he shall be of opinion that there is sufficient grounds to suspect that he is guilty of offence, he will not be discharged. Now, to me, it appears that this is a proper and necessary power to be vested in our judges, and that a suspension of the writ of habeas corpos is, in all cases, improper. If a man is taken up, and is denied an examination before a judge or a court, he may, although innocent, in this case, continue to suffer confinement. This, in my opinion, is dangerous to the liberty of the citizen. He may be taken up on vague suspicion, and may not have his case examined for months, or even for years. Would not this bear hard upon the rights of the citizen?

Let us turn over a leaf, and see how the Government stands. If the person accused is legally committed, or if it shall be proved that he has committed any offence, the judge will say that he shall not be released. If he has committed an offence, there can be no grounds for this suspicion, because, without such suspension, he will not be discharged, because it does not follow that, inasmuch as a man has a right to demand that he be brought before a judge by a writ of habeas corpus, he shall therefore be discharged. He is only bound to examine him, and if he finds there is strong reason to believe he has committed a crime, he may remand him to confinement.

This is a writ of right, which ought to exist under all Governments on earth. What right? The right of being examined by the tribunals of his country, to determine whether there is any ground for the deprivation of his liberty. Is this a right which ought to be suspended merely to gratify the apprehensions of gentlemen? I think not. The framers of the Constitution have said, "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall 'not be suspended, except when, in cases of invasion or rebellion, the public safety shall require 'it." Well, but, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, can any one deny that this is a rebellion? It may perhaps be, but I think it does not deserve the name of a rebellion; it is a little, petty, trifling, contemptible thing, led on by a deperate man, at the head of a few desperate followers: a thing which might have been dangerous, if the virtue of the people had not arrested and destroyed it. But admit that it is a rebellion; will every rebellion justify a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus? The Constitution says, "the privilege of the writ 'of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except 'when, in cases of invasion or rebellion, the public 'safety shall require it." Does, then, the public safety require this suspension? Does the Constitution justify it? And, under present circumstances, confining a man in prison without a cause. There is no danger, the enemy is not at our door; there is no invasion; and yet we are called upon to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. This precedent, let me tell gentlemen, may be a ruinous, may be a most damnable precedent—a precedent which, hereafter, may be most flagrantly abused. The Executive may wish to make use of more energetic measures than the established laws of the land enable him to do; he will resort to this as a precedent, and this important privilege will be suspended at the smallest appearance of danger. The effect will be, that whenever a man is at the head of our affairs, who wishes to oppress or wreak his vengeance on those who are opposed to him, he will fly to this as a precedent; it will truly be a precedent fraught with the greatest danger; a precedent which ought not to be set, except in a case of the greatest necessity; indeed, I can hardly contemplate a case in which, in my opinion, it can be necessary.

In my opinion, this is a measure which ought never to be proposed, unless when the country is so corrupt that we cannot even trust the judges themselves. This, I consider the cause of the frequent suspension of this privilege in England. Whenever the whole mass of society becomes contaminated, and the officers of the judicial court are so far corrupted as to countenance rebellion, and release rebels from their confinement, it may be then time to say, they shall no longer remain in your hands; we will take them from you. But I apprehend there is no such danger here, and I repeat it, we are at once creating one of the most dangerous precedents, and passing one of the most unjust acts that was ever proposed.

Mr. SLOAN.—At the same time that I express my purpose to vote on the same side with the gentleman from Maryland, I shall take the liberty of assigning very different reasons for my vote from those offered by him. The gentleman from Virginia has mentioned two preceding insurrections, which he considers of much greater magnitude than this. I am of a different opinion. Compared to this, I consider them as only a drop to the bucket. For a moment, let me ask the attention of gentlemen to those insurrections, or as I think they might, with more correctness, be termed, oppositions to Government. In consequence of certain citizens thinking themselves aggrieved by certain acts, in which they have been, in some measure, justified by their subsequent repeal, a handful of people raised in opposition to their execution. What analogy do those oppositions bear to this rebellion? I consider the late or present conspiracy to be of greater magnitude than any we know of in history. Under what authority has it been created? Under that of a man of great abilities and experience, who states that he expects encouragement from foreign nations. I do not pretend to say that this is a fact; but what has he done? Has he not drawn resources from every part of the Union? I, therefore, consider it of great magnitude, and it is certainly excited against the best Government on earth, under which the people enjoy the greatest happiness. I shall, however, vote against the bill, under the belief that we may confidently rely on the love and affection of the people for their Government, to which we are already probably indebted for its suppression. Had this measure been brought forward a month or six weeks ago, I should have voted for it.

Mr. BIDWELL said, although he was not satisfied of the necessity of passing this bill, he was not prepared to reject it, in its present stage. As it had received the sanction of the Senate, he was disposed to treat it as a subject worthy of discussion and deliberation, by referring it, in the usual course, to a Committee of the whole House.

Before the passing of any bill of this nature, the House ought to have satisfactory proof that a rebellion in fact existed (for there was no pretence of an invasion) and that the public safety required a suspension of the privilege of habeas corpus. By the terms of the Constitution, both of these pre-requisites must concur, to authorize the measure. The first inquiry would naturally turn upon the existence of a rebellion. On that point he had no doubt. To constitute a rebellion, in the sense of the Constitution, he did not think it necessary that a battle should have been fought, or even a single gun fired. If troops were enlisted, assembled, organized, and armed, for the purpose of effecting a treasonable object, it amounted to actual rebellion. Such was the existing state of things. The public notoriety of the fact was, perhaps, sufficient evidence for the Legislature to act upon, if necessary; but they had also the official statement of the President to that effect. He had, therefore, no doubt of the existence of a rebellion, and that, too, of a more wanton and malignant character than any insurrection which had heretofore been raised against our Government; for it had not been occasioned by any grievances, real or imaginary, but must have originated in motives of personal ambition or some more unworthy passion.

An existing rebellion, however, even of this aggravated description, was not alone sufficient to justify a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. To bring it within Constitutional justification, it must be required by the public safety. That was a matter of opinion, rather than of fact. He was convinced that the proposed suspension was not requisite for the purpose of suppressing the conspiracy; for by the vigilance and energy of our Executive Government, seconded and supported by the exertions of particular States and Territories and the army, this deep laid conspiracy was already in a good measure suppressed, and he trusted the means now in operation would complete the suppression. A suspension of the habeas corpus could not be necessary, except for the detection and conviction of the conspirators. A thorough investigation ought undoubtedly to be made. If any persons, concerned in the conspiracy, were arrested in situations which precluded an immediate production of such evidence, as would warrant their confinement, justice would require that they should be detained until the proper evidence could be procured; but in the mean time they might be discharged by virtue of a habeas corpus; for, though he agreed with the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) in the importance and utility of this writ, he could not subscribe to the doctrine which he understood that gentleman to maintain, that it would entitle a person to a discharge only for causes of irregularity in the arrest. Want of legal evidence to show, by oath or affirmation, probable cause for detention, would be a ground of discharge. In ordinary cases, indeed, the release and escape of a guilty person, for such want of evidence, was esteemed a smaller evil, than a denial of the common privilege. If it were so, in respect to this conspiracy, there was, in his opinion, no good reason for passing this bill. That was a point, which appeared to him worthy of some deliberation.

It had been mentioned, in the debate, that in the whole history of our Government, notwithstanding two insurrections, the habeas corpus had, in no instance, been suspended. It was true. But an instance had been cited from one of the States. During the insurrection in Massachusetts there was such a suspension, in pursuance of a Constitutional provision; and it was generally acknowledged to have been a necessary and salutary measure. He had never understood that it was abused, or that it was considered by the people of that State a dangerous example. It was justified by the occasion. But it did not, therefore, follow that a similar suspension would be justifiable on this occasion. That must depend on the present state and circumstances of the nation. Although a rebellion existed, he was not satisfied that the public safety required so strong and severe a measure. But, as it was an important question, on which the House had not yet taken time to deliberate, he was willing that the bill should go, according to the usual course of proceeding, to a Committee of the Whole; and therefore, he should not give his vote for rejecting it in the present state.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH.—I shall give my vote in a very different manner from the gentleman who has just sat down. I was extremely happy to witness the very prompt and decided opposition this measure received in the House, and from the quarter whence that opposition originated; and I subscribe with great pleasure to the sound Constitutional doctrine, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania advanced this morning before our doors were opened. We are now told that to reject this bill at its first reading, will be to depart from the usual course of proceeding in this House, and an attempt is made to enlist the feelings of members so far at least as to permit the bill to progress one step farther, that we may avoid violating that decorum which ought to be observed between the two Houses. I do not, however, consider the subject in this light. I conceive, on the contrary, it is as competent to us to reject the bill on its first as on any other reading. I well recollect that about eight years ago an important bill was smuggled through the House by this fastidious mode of proceeding. Gentlemen were allured from their honest opinions, and finally, by finesse and management, the bill was carried through the House. I understand that this course is pursued by the other branch of the Legislature on bills carried from this House; and I believe it will be found that with regard to the passage of bills between the two Houses, the course of procedure on the part of this House is more liberal than that pursued by the other. For I do not recollect a single instance in which the vote of a single member can stop the passage of a bill in this House received from the other branch of the Legislature. I, therefore, feel no scruples on this score. I think it just as well to say, that we will permit this bill to pass to a second or third reading, as to say that though we are opposed to the principle contained in a resolution which may originate in this House, we nevertheless permit a committee to bring in a bill to carry it into effect, because we may destroy the bill at its last stage. This appears to be a strange course of reasoning. It is like permitting yourselves to be bound in chains that you may be loosed again, or going into prison that you may afterwards come out. Gentlemen talk of the propriety of discussing this subject, but when a subject is so clear that every man has made up his mind upon it, where is the need of discussion? If it is not so clear, will any gentleman say that the discussion now had, in which every member has a right to speak twice, which is once more in my opinion than is necessary, will not be sufficient to develop all the merits and demerits of the bill? Will gentlemen undertake to say, if every member shall give the mature, or as it may be, crude, suggestions of his mind, that the subject will not be sufficiently discussed, and lead to the formation of a correct judgment? I believe it will. And therefore, on this ground, a bill may as well be decided in its present stage as before a Committee of the Whole.

Some gentlemen, to whom I have listened with considerable gratification, tell us that, out of respect to the other branch, we ought not at this time to reject the bill. I however, feel no such respect on this occasion, and shall express none. On the contrary, I am free to declare, that when a measure, tending to impose a burden on the people, or to detract from the privileges of the citizen, comes from that quarter, I shall always view it with jealousy. The inequality of the representation in that branch, the long tenure of office, and the custom with which they are so familiar of conducting their proceedings in conclave, (the House will recollect how long it was after the adoption of the Constitution before the public could get admission into their twopenny gallery,) render all their proceedings, touching the public burdens, or the liberties of the people, highly suspicious. And to say the truth, I am not at all surprised that they did close their doors on this occasion, that they might not be under the inspection of the public eye, while they were passing the bill on the table. I say so, because I am willing to abide by the good old principle of judging all men by myself, and if I had introduced such a bill, I should have been glad my name did not appear on the journals, that the public might not know to whom they were indebted for such a precedent.

I have another objection to the bill, besides that of the quarter from which it originated, or the manner in which it has been presented to the House. It appears to my mind like an oblique attempt to cover a certain departure from an established law of the land, and a certain violation of the Constitution of the United States, which we are told have been committed in this country. Sir, recollect that Congress met on the first of December, that the President had information of the incipient stage of this conspiracy about the last of September—that the proclamation issued before Congress met, and yet that no suggestion, either from the Executive or from either branch of the Legislature, has transpired touching the propriety of suspending the writ of habeas corpus until this violation has taken place. I will never agree in this side-way to cover up such a violation, by a proceeding highly dangerous to the liberty of the country, or to agree that this invaluable privilege shall be suspended, because it has been already violated, and suspended, too, after the cause, if any there was, for it has ceased to exist. No, I wish to be true to those principles which I have constantly maintained, and, God willing, ever will maintain so long as I have a seat on this floor, or have life. It has heretofore been the glory of those with whom I have acted, that in all our battles we have combatted for the principles of the Constitution and the laws of our country, in the persons of those in which they have been attempted to be violated, however infamous and contemptible. When those principles were prostrated under the Sedition law, what did we say? That the character of the man accused could not change the laws of the land, or impair his rights—that we would support the Constitutional rights of the citizen, in the person of the meanest reptile, as well as in the persons of those who occupy the highest stations in society. We have done so—let us continue to do so, regardless of popular clamor or odium, and we shall still continue to find ourselves on true ground. We never inquired what kind of a man Callender was—we said, such is the law and the Constitution; let justice take its course. I could quote other examples equally strong, but in deference to the feelings of the House I shall desist from doing it.

I beg pardon for detaining the House so long. I will however, endeavor to express the remaining ideas I have to offer in a few words. There is another consideration which renders this bill highly objectionable. I consider the case as now at issue; whether the United States is under a military or civil government, or, in other words, whether the military government is subject to the civil power, or the civil authority to the military. I conceive that a case has occurred, in which the military has not only usurped the civil authority, but in which it has usurped nothing short of omnipotent power; and I consider this bill as calculated to give a softening and smoothing over to this usurpation; and on this ground I cannot assent to it. Suppose this bill either to pass or not to pass, what has been the practice under the Constitution? By the expression under the Constitution, I do not mean conformably to it. Men have been taken up by a military tribunal, and have been transported contrary to law. I say transported, for if a man can be transported from the district where the offence with which he is charged was committed, he may also be deported to Cayenne, or transported to Botany Bay. And even you yourself, (addressing the Speaker) if such acts be sanctioned by this bill, in your passage from this House to your lodgings, may be arrested, put on board a vessel and carried whithersoever the military authority may choose. To this I will never give my consent. It has been very well remarked by my colleague, that this is not the first case in which an insurrection has occurred in the United States, but that it is the first case in which an attempt has been made to suspend the precious privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

I put it to any man, whether, now that we have received information of the extent of this conspiracy, and when we find that Catiline, Cethegus, and Lentulus, have not as many brother conspirators as themselves, this conspiracy is equal to that in Pennsylvania in 1794 or 1795? In physical force it is not comparable to it, however in intellectual talent it may be. I conceive then that according to the Constitution of the United States, there is but one case in which the writ of habeas corpus can be suspended, and I should not go into this view of the subject, if it had not been misstated by all those who have preceded me in the debate. My view of the subject is this—that this privilege can only be suspended in cases, in which, not merely the public safety requires it, but that the case of the public safety requiring it, must be united with actual invasion or actual rebellion. Now, with whatever epithets gentlemen may dignify this conspiracy, I am not even of the opinion of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. R. NELSON)—I think it nothing more nor less than an intrigue—and I am happy that I can declare on the honor, not of a soldier, but of a citizen, that I believe it to be a foreign intrigue, availing itself of domestic materials for answering its purposes, and poor indeed must be the soil of this, or of any other state of society, which, would not furnish such materials.

A gentleman from Massachusetts has stated to the House that the organization and administration of the Government, at this time, forbids the apprehension of any abuse being made of the powers delegated under this law. Surely, sir, the gentleman could not mean to urge this as anything new. He must have known, if he had consulted history—as doubtless he has—that the king de facto, and the administration de facto, are always above suspicion. That there never was a proposition brought forward, that did not find a majority ready to say, There is, surely, no danger of any improper use of this power in our time, for we are all honorable men, and we would not delegate it, if an improper use could be made of it; and that, if we reject a measure, we ought not to do it so much on account of ourselves, as on account of those who come after us. And what will those who come after us say of us? They will follow our example, and declare that the character of their forefathers was above every doubt and every suspicion. Now, for myself, I beg leave to be permitted to disclaim every argument of this kind. I do not, indeed, consider it fair to introduce such an argument. Let us take up the question on its own merits and demerits, without any allusion or reference to our own virtues, or the degeneracy of posterity. For myself, I have no hesitation in saying that I will not grant this power at any time, except under the most imperious necessity; and I say this without any disrespect to this honorable body, or to any of the public functionaries. Take man as he is, and in his best estate, you find him an animal prone to abuse and corruption. There does not exist a single constitution or law in the world, that does not enforce this salutary truth.

I shall consider this bill, if it passes, as establishing a new era in the Government. When I was a boy, I recollect to have consulted such chronological tables as I could get access to. I recollect to have read, that at a certain time, monarchy was abolished in Rome; a little while after, the first Dictator was named; then the second Dictator—and I believe, as in a case of apoplexy, she scarcely got over the third fit. I believe a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus might have, here, the same effect as the establishment of the first Dictatorship at Rome. In what situation would it place yourselves and the citizens of this country? It would leave them at the mercy, not merely of a justice of the peace, but at the mercy of every subaltern officer of the army and navy. I believe it would comport as much with the safety and interest of this Confederacy to give us power to send these people off, as to put this power in their hands. I believe we should be as trustworthy as they. And, let me ask, what compensation to an innocent man, to a man of honor and feeling, to a man of character, who should be tied neck and heels and sent off to New Orleans, and who should ultimately be proved to be innocent—I ask what compensation it would be to him to bring an action of damages? Against whom? A man without visible property? And what action? An action on the most mercenary principle. To be indemnified in his fame by dollars and cents. The injury would be irreparable. At present, all stand under the law. If any one offend, let him be brought under it. But, in this way, to put a man in an oyster boat, or skipper, and transport him to a distance from the place of his arrest, and then say he shall have a remedy, in case of his innocence, against an inferior officer, is absurd. If we pass such a bill, which God forbid! it should contain a large appropriation, and Government should be obliged to make good the injured party—to afford him redress. I say they should grant a large appropriation, for, it is not for men with epaulets and gold buttons to make reparation. If the bill passes, we are told it will be but temporary. Why, the Sedition law was but temporary; and I think, sir, (alluding to the Speaker) you were one of those who aided its passage—much against your will—by being present at the altar when it was more than once re-enacted. As to its three months' continuance, I consider that as one of the most objectionable features of the bill—as a bait to the trap; as the entering wedge. If it is made reconcilable to the interests and feelings of this House to pass it for three months, do you think we will then feel the same lively repugnance to it that we now do? No! It has been truly said, that no man became perfectly wicked at once; and it may be affirmed, with equal truth, that a nation is never enslaved at once. Men must be initiated by degrees, and their repugnance must be gradually overcome. Let me state a case. It is proposed to extend the time of service of the Executive Magistrate from four, to five, or eight years, or for life. If it be prolonged for a term, do you believe we shall stop at its expiration? No! Once extended for life, he will then claim the power to choose his successor, and the hereditary principle will follow. This is the old trick. Let me, however, tell gentlemen that old birds are not to be caught with chaff, though, unfortunately for them, the mass of mankind does not consist of old birds. Pass one other law, and I would quit the country. A twin brother to this same bill was introduced into the British Parliament in 1794; and that bill, to prevent seditious assemblies, was brought forward for about as good reasons as this. According to it, if four or five persons assembled, and refused, on the notice of a magistrate, to disperse, they were considered guilty of sedition, and were dispersed by force. These two bills form a complete tyranny—and tyranny of the most odious kind, because established under the mask of liberty. Was the tyranny of Robespierre less intolerable, oppressive, or odious, because inflicted in the name of the people, than a like tyranny in Turkey, under the Grand Seignior and his Muftis? Take one other thing along with you. These two fatal wounds, inflicted on the liberties of the English nation, were inflicted by the man who came forward in the character of a reformer—by the man who came forward as the advocate of a Parliamentary reform; from which circumstance he acquired that popularity which enabled him to inflict those deadly wounds on the liberty of his country.

Having said so much with regard to the principle, permit me to add one word on the details of the bill. There is a departure in it from the known, accustomed, and received language of the Constitution, in the use of the word "authority." The words are "warrant or authority." The expression is, in my opinion, too lax. Perhaps, we may be told, that the bill may be amended on the third reading. But my objection to the principle contained in it is such, that I will not consent to carry to a third reading that, which, under no amendment, can be rendered palatable to my taste. Mr. R. concluded by observing that he had so far exhausted himself that he was unable to go on.

Mr. SMILIE.—I shall not detain the House long by the remarks which I propose to make on this subject. I shall waive all observations on the mode of proceeding on this occasion—whether we shall reject the bill on its first, or suffer it to go to a second reading. The question is now put, and I am called upon to give my vote, either in the affirmative or negative. I, therefore, feel under a necessity to put my negative upon it. I consider this one of the most important subjects upon which we have been called to act. It is a question which is neither more nor less than, whether we shall exercise the only power with which we are clothed, to repeal an important part of the Constitution? It is in this case only, that we have power to repeal that instrument. A suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is, in all respects, equivalent to repealing that essential part of the Constitution which secures that principle which has been called, in the country where it originated, the "palladium of personal liberty." If we recur to England, we shall find that the writ of habeas corpus in that country has been frequently suspended. But, under what circumstances? We find it was suspended in the year 1715, but what was the situation of the country at that time? It was invaded by the son of James II. There was a rebellion within the kingdom, and an army was organized. The same thing happened in the year 1745. On this occasion it was found necessary to suspend it. In latter times, when the Government had grown more corrupt, we have seen it suspended for an infinitely less cause. We have taken from the statute book of this country, this most valuable part of our Constitution. The convention who framed that instrument, believing that there might be cases when it would be necessary to vest a discretionary power in the Executive, have constituted the Legislature the judges of this necessity, and the only question now to be determined is, Does this necessity exist? There must either be in the country a rebellion or an invasion, before such an act can be passed. I really doubt whether either of these exist. I really doubt whether a single law of the United States has been, as yet, violated. I will not say this is the fact; but I do not know anything to prove the contrary. But, supposing that a rebellion does exist, we are then left at liberty to decide whether it is such an one as to endanger the peace of society to such a degree that no ordinary remedy will answer. If an ordinary remedy will not, it may be our duty to apply an extraordinary one. What is this mighty business? What is the opinion of the Executive as to its danger? Does he consider it dangerous? It is a little remarkable that, in every instance under the British Government, the proposition of such a measure originated with the Executive, while here, without any intimation of danger from the Executive, we propose, on our own suggestion, to suspend one of the most valuable privileges that is secured to the citizen. Let us attend to the communication of the President on this subject. He states that, according to his information, the persons concerned in the conspiracy depend on receiving two kinds of aid; foreign aid, and aid derived in their own country. After giving his opinion of the foreign aid expected, he says:

"On the whole, the fugitives from the Ohio, with their associates from Cumberland, or any other place in that quarter, cannot threaten serious danger to the city of New Orleans."

The President declares that, in his opinion, there is no danger to be apprehended. With regard to foreign force, he states his reasons for thinking there is no danger. As the Message is in the hands of every gentleman, there can be no necessity for me to read it. But, he explicitly declares, from the state of our relations with other nations, there can be no danger from that quarter. This being the deliberate opinion of the Executive Magistrate, who is more deeply responsible on this occasion than any other member of the Government, is it not most extraordinary that we should attempt to take steps which can only be justified in the last resort? Are gentlemen aware of the danger of this precedent? This is the first attempt ever made under the Government to suspend this law. If we suspend it when the Executive tells us there is no danger, on what occasion may it not be suspended? Let us suppose that it shall be suspended on this occasion, what will be its effect? Parties will probably forever continue to exist in this country. Let us suppose a predominant party to conjure up a plot to avenge themselves. Do not gentlemen see that the personal liberty of all their enemies would be endangered? I mention this to forewarn gentlemen of the dangerous ground before them. I do not say that our country may not, at some future day, be in such a situation as to justify such a suspension, but I have never yet seen her in such a situation, and, at this moment, I think it does not exist. When we see the great body of the people so firmly attached to their Government, ought we to be thus alarmed on beholding a few desperate and unprincipled men attempting to stir up an insurrection? There is another consideration which will induce me to give my hearty negative to this bill. If foreign nations see that we are obliged, under such circumstances, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, will it not show that the Constitution is incapable of supporting itself, without the application of the most dangerous and extraordinary remedies?

Mr. DANA.—I understand that the question is, whether the bill shall be rejected on its first reading, without passing through the ordinary forms of proceeding. In such cases, the ordinary question is, Is there anything in the bill proper for the House to deliberate upon? If they are of opinion that it can be modified in such a way as to insure its passage, it ought to go to a Committee of the Whole. This was my opinion when the motion was first made to reject the bill. I was disposed to vote against the question, although the bill went to repeal the Constitution. I have been accustomed to view the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus as the most glorious invention of man. I was notwithstanding, however, from a respect to the other branch of the Legislature, disposed to investigate the subject—to examine whether there was any necessity for it. As, on the one hand, I was inclined to believe that the judgment of the Senate had, on this occasion, been tinged by a strong abhorrence of rebellion; so I was willing, on the other, to take time to guard myself against an equally strong feeling of abhorrence of dictators. But, on one principle, I cannot agree to consider this bill as a proper subject of investigation, for one moment. I perceive, on further examination of the bill, that the Senate have provided for its suspension, in cases where persons have been already presented. Had it been confined to future arrests, I might have agreed to deliberate on it, but viewing it in the light of an ex post facto law, I must give it my instantaneous negative. There is another principle, which appears to me highly objectionable. It authorizes the arrest of persons, not merely by the President, or other high officers, but by any person acting under him. I imagine this to be wholly without precedent. If treason was marching to force us from our seats, I would not agree to do this. I would not agree thus to destroy the fundamental principles of the Constitution, or to commit such an act, either of despotism or pusillanimity. Under this view of the subject, I am disposed to reject the bill, as containing a proposition on which I cannot deliberate.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the question, "Shall the bill be rejected?"—yeas 113, nays 19, as follows:

On motion of Mr. Early, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill.

Mr. Eppes moved to strike out the second section of the bill. This motion gave rise to a long debate, which continued till the House adjourned. It was supported by Messrs. Eppes, Fisk, Ely, Sloan, Holland, and D. R. Williams, and opposed by Messrs. J. Clay, Cook, and Dana, and lost—yeas 44, nays 49.

Mr. J. Clay in the course of his remarks observed, there were some Members in the House, who, looking no farther than the surface, exclaimed against the carrying trade. Mr. C. then went at some length into a defence of the carrying trade. He who exports the produce of the country, must take in return, either specie, or articles of foreign growth, or manufacture. Specie cannot, except in a few places, be procured. If the merchant send flour or tobacco to France, he must generally take brandy or wine in return. If the articles he thus takes and imports are not wanted in this country, he must re-export them to places where they are wanted, and where he can procure in exchange either money, or something wanted at home. If you throw obstacles in the way of the carrying trade, you discourage the exportation of the surplus produce of the country, any further than that produce can be sold abroad for money or for articles consumed in this country. Such is the value of the carrying trade, and such is the foundation of the system of drawbacks.

Mr. D. R. Williams said that he felt no hostility to the merchants, but, to the carrying trade and to the drawback system he felt the most rancorous hostility. It was the foundation of all our quarrels, and all our difficulties with foreign Powers. It was the only cause of our present clashing with Great Britain. It had entailed immense evil on the country.

The Committee rose and reported the bill, when the House immediately adjourned.

Wednesday, February 4.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a report

Clay, from the committee to whom was referred, on the sixteenth of December last, the petition of Elexius Spalding, presented a bill to provide for the payment of certain expenses incurred in the impeachment of Samuel Chase; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Campbell, from the committee to whom was committed, on the twenty-seventh ultimo, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act establishing Circuit Courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the District Courts in the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio," made a report thereon; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate for the relief of Seth Harding.

Messrs. Van Cortlandt, Mumford, Elmer, Smilie, Conrad, and Jackson, supported the bill. Mr. Quincy suggested some difficulty with regard to the fund from which it was proposed to derive relief.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act confirming claims to lands in the district of Vincennes;" also, an act, entitled "An act to reduce the expenses attending the administration of justice in the District of Columbia;" to which they severally desire the concurrence of this House.

INDEMNITY TO COLLECTORS.

Mr. Early, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the second ultimo, the memorial of David Gelston, Collector of the Customs in the city of New York, presented a bill respecting seizures made under the authority of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. Early also laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

Treasury Department, Jan. 22, 1807.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit copies of the vouchers sent by Mr. Gelston to the Comptroller's office, and establishing the facts stated in his petition that he had paid $9,974 62, recovered from him in two suits instituted against him for damages arising from a seizure made by him, as collector, of two vessels which were presumed to be owned by foreigners, though sailing under American registers. Although the proofs were not sufficient to obtain a condemnation of the vessels, the circumstances were such as did justify the attempt. But the accounting officers had no authority to allow to the collector the amount of damages recovered; and the hardship of the case consists particularly in that, in case of condemnation, the United States would have received one-half of the net proceeds of the forfeiture, and the collector one-sixth part of the same; while, in case of acquittal and subsequent damages, the whole falls on the collector who has made the seizure.

Whatever may be the determination of Congress in this case, it appears proper that some general provision may be adopted, which, without injuring the citizens, may protect the collectors, and ultimately the United States, against actions of this kind, when the seizure shall appear to have been made on reasonable grounds.

It is provided, by the 89th section of the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, that, "when any prosecution shall be commenced on account of the seizure of any ship or vessel, goods, wares, or merchandise, and judgment shall be given for the claimant or claimants, if it shall appear to the court before whom such prosecution shall be tried, that there was a reasonable cause of seizure, the said court shall cause a proper certificate or entry to be made thereof, and, in such case, the claimant or claimants shall not be entitled to costs, nor shall the person who made the seizure, or the prosecutor, be liable to action, suit, or judgment, on account of such seizure and prosecution." But this provision extends only to revenue cases arising under the act, and applies neither to the registering act, nor to the acts prohibiting the slave trade, nor to the acts prohibiting the intercourse with St. Domingo, or the importation of certain goods from the dominions of Great Britain. It necessarily results that the execution of those laws is not enforced as it ought to be; and that, principally, since the damages recovered in the case now under consideration have been known, collectors cannot be expected to make seizures at the risk, perhaps, of the whole amount of their property, even in cases where circumstances are extremely suspicious, and it is expected that a legal investigation will lead to a full discovery. The same will happen in cases where the law is not perfectly clear, and where a judicial decision is in fact necessary to fix its meaning.

If the provision above-mentioned be proper in revenue cases, it cannot be improper in the cases arising under the registering act, or under any other law which authorizes a seizure. If the collector dares to seize without reasonable cause, the court will refuse a certificate, and the party will recover damages, which, in such case, Congress never can be called upon to refund. But, unless the provision be thus extended, either the collectors must be assured that Congress will always indemnify them, or the laws will remain in a great degree unexecuted, and those provisions, particularly, which were intended to protect the American flag, be materially impaired.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. Peter Early, Chairman, &c.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, made on the twenty-third ultimo, on the report of the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates "to the repairs of fortifications, and to the farther protection of our ports, towns, and rivers:" Whereupon the second resolution, reported by the said Committee of the Whole, being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That a farther sum of money, not exceeding two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, be appropriated to enable the President of the United States to cause to be built a number of gunboats, not exceeding fifty, for the better protection of our ports, towns, and rivers; and the farther sum of —— dollars, to enable the President of the United States to arm, man, and equip, the whole, or such number of gunboats, as he may think the public service may require:"

The motion of Mr. Van Cortlandt, to amend the resolution, by adding, after gunboats, "and other armed vessels," still depending—

Mr. Mumford said: I rise to make a motion. As it is probable the chairman of the Committee on the Fortifications of the Ports and Harbors will not return for some days, and as the session is progressing to a close, I hope the House will now consent to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on that subject.

The House agreed to take up the report.

Mr. Mosely.—I should not have supposed that there would have been any objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

I should not have imagined that the most zealous advocates for gunboats would be unwilling to give the President the discretionary power which this amendment proposes.

Are gentlemen apprehensive that so great a proportion of this sum will be appropriated to the equipment of vessels of a different description as essentially to interfere with their favorite system of defence by gunboats? Surely, sir, there can be no danger of this. If we are to judge from past experience, or from present appearances, there can be no doubt but that gunboats are destined to constitute the principal naval force of our country, and to afford the only protection of consequence which we are to expect for our ports and harbors. The votes which have already passed in this House clearly evince their determination on this point.

The President certainly has never manifested any hostility to gunboats, nor recently, I believe, any disposition to encourage a maritime force of any other description.

Indeed, it appears from the documents before us, that he has, on the present occasion, instructed the Secretary of the Navy to state that, in his opinion, it would be expedient at this time to build sixty additional gunboats. And if our sole reliance is to be placed upon gunboats, no one, I presume, will contend that this number can be more than competent for the complete defence of all our ports and harbors.

But, however useful gunboats may be in the estimation of some gentlemen in certain cases, and under certain circumstances, it must be conceded that there may be exigencies when, if they were ever so numerous, if our shores were lined with them, that a single frigate would be of more efficiency, and might be employed to much greater advantage. Why not, then, when we have them on hand; when they lie useless and rotting in our harbors; why not authorize the President to make use of other armed vessels in commission with gunboats, provided he should judge it expedient? I know, sir, that gentlemen are very fruitful in their objections to every measure of defence that is proposed, either by sea or land.

It was said when this subject was under discussion a few days since, by some gentlemen, that they were opposed to a naval force, because it would involve us in incalculable expense, and eventually prove destructive to the liberties of the people.

It was again contended that, as our seacoast was so extensive, and our ports and harbors so numerous, it would be impracticable to fortify and secure them, and, therefore, that nothing ought to be done; but the whole of them must be left entirely defenceless and exposed to pillage and destruction from the most inconsiderable force that might choose to attack them.

The inhabitants, it is true, were very kindly informed that, in case of invasion, they might flee back to the mountains, or to the interior of the country, and find perfect safety.

Sir, I apprehend that this numerous and respectable class of our citizens, who inhabit the wealthy and populous cities and towns upon our seacoasts, will duly appreciate sentiments of this sort. They will no doubt feel all the respect and gratitude which they ought for the liberal and enlightened policy of a Government which guards with such parental solicitude the welfare and interests of every portion of the community.

But I ought to beg pardon; these were not precisely the sentiments of a majority of the House. They did vote to appropriate $20,000 for the purpose of improving and repairing our fortifications. Not the fortifications at any one particular place, but the whole of the fortifications throughout the United States. Twenty thousand dollars! about half the sum that was appropriated the last Winter for the purpose of finishing a single room in the south wing of this Capitol, for our own accommodation; rather more, I believe, than we have expended the present Winter in repairing the walls of the room we now occupy. But, Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to treat this subject with levity. I view it as a very serious one; but when we compare the sum appropriated with the object to which it is to be applied, it does really appear—I will not say contemptible, but I will say, what I presume no man will deny, that it is as small a sum as the most rigid principles of economy could justify a magnanimous Legislature in granting, provided they thought proper to grant anything.

But I perceive that I am extending my remarks further than I intended when I rose. My intention was to confine them to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, which simply proposes to authorize the President, provided he should judge it expedient, to arm and equip some other of our armed vessels in addition to, or in connexion with the gunboats to be employed.

The amendment appears to me so reasonable and so unobjectionable, that I cannot but persuade myself the House will think fit to adopt it.

Mr. D. R. Williams said he was extremely surprised at the observations of the gentleman from Connecticut. He would have supposed that a regard to decency would have prevented the remarks made by him in the abence of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Nelson,) particularly on a point to which those remarks had no relevancy. The only question before the House was whether they should vest the President of the United States with the power of increasing the naval establishment at pleasure. On examining the documents before the House, gentlemen would find there was this year a much larger sum applicable to fortifications than had been expended the last year. Of the hundred and fifty thousand dollars then appropriated only about forty-eight thousand had been expended. Consequently $102,000 remained. In addition to this sum would be found an item of $75,000 in the estimates, to which it was now proposed to add $20,000, making altogether near $200,000. If the Government could not expend the last year more than $48,000, would not 200,000 be amply sufficient for the present year?

Mr. W. said he was decidedly hostile to vesting the President with a power to increase the naval establishment at will. Wherefore the necessity of the Naval Peace Establishment, if it was to be thus increased in this side way? Mr. W. concluded by observing that there never had, under the former Administration, been proposed a greater outrage on principle than this.

Mr. Mosely.—I never before understood that it could be considered indecorous or improper to reply to arguments which had been stated upon the floor of this House, in the absence of the gentleman who had advanced them. Had my opinion corresponded with that of the gentleman from South Carolina upon this subject, I might perhaps have spared the remarks which seem to him so exceptionable; had I, indeed, noticed or recollected the absence of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, which, if necessary, I could assure the gentleman from South Carolina that I did not until mentioned by him. But, sir, as I entertain a different opinion upon the point of order and decorum from the gentleman from South Carolina, I should consider myself justifiable in making the same remarks in the absence of the gentleman from Maryland, as I should suppose myself authorized in making were he present. Nor would the presence of that gentleman, however formidable the opposition I might in that case expect to meet with, deter me from submitting such observations as I should consider pertinent to the subject, and compatible with the rules of decorum in debate. Whether my remarks were relevant to the subject under consideration the House must decide.

Mr. Elliot said he did not think the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut indecorous. But he thought the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Nelson) could not be reprobated in too strong terms.

The question before the House, said Mr. E., is whether we shall vest the President with the power of augmenting the navy. I would not do this, if I could help it. I regret the necessity of the measure. But consistently with the economical politics of the day, which, like the subtile principle of chemistry, caloric, pervades the whole system, without animating it, we must, consistently with our principles, vote for it. The Legislature of the Union will not agree to do anything. Supposing that it is true policy to do something to provide against the occurrence of danger, is it not, on the belief that danger will arise during the recess, indispensably necessary to vest this power? The system of the gentleman from Maryland is worse than the ancient system recommended by Hudibras, who says, that "He that fights and runs away,

May live to fight another day."

Whereas, according to the plan of the gentleman from Maryland, we are to run away without fighting at all. I hope that such a doctrine will ever be reprobated, and I trust, that whenever the subject comes before this House, there will be no voice heard but that of political reprobation.

Mr. Lloyd said it was not his intention to have opened his mouth on this subject. But he had always understood that it was indecorous to call up a report in the absence of the Chairman. He would not say that this was improper in the present instance. But he professed he saw no necessity for it, as the Chairman was expected to return in a fortnight. But as the subject had been brought forward, would it not have been decorous to avoid commenting on the remarks of his colleague, who had no opportunity to reply? If, however, he recollected what had been said by his colleague, he did not take the ground ascribed to him. He had only said, that, rather than incur the expense of completely fortifying the coast, he would give it up, retire into the interior, and depend for defence on the militia, who were undoubtedly the strong defence of the nation. Doubtless meaning that he would in the first instance defend the seacoast as well as he could, and, if necessary, retire into the interior. This was conformable to the habits of his colleague. He had never been in the habit of running from any man. At the period to which gentlemen had alluded, he had been among the foremost to defend his country, and his gallantry, and the services he had rendered, ought to have convinced every one that he would have been the last man to skulk from danger.

Mr. Lloyd said he was not only decidedly opposed to the amendment, but likewise to both of the resolutions. He was opposed to appropriating $20,000, because he believed it would do no good. He was also opposed to the appropriation for gunboats, as they related to an experiment not yet tried. There were already sixty, for which an appropriation had been made. These are a sufficient number with which to try the experiment. Let us first determine their utility before we appropriate large sums of money; until we are satisfied of their utility, let us cease any further appropriation. Mr. L. said it was not his habit to profess confidence in any man. In saying so, he was not to be understood as saying he had less confidence in the members of the existing Administration than many of those who talked so much about it.

Mr. Elliot said there was nothing further from his intention than the making a political or personal attack on the colleague of the gentleman from Maryland, whom he respected as a man, as an officer, and as a member of the House.

Mr. Lloyd said he was convinced that the object of the resolutions would be as well answered two weeks hence as at present. For the purpose, therefore, of affording his colleague an opportunity of defending his remarks, and under a conviction that he was, perhaps, better informed on the subject, than any other member in the House, he moved the postponement of their further consideration till Monday fortnight.

Mr. Thomas hoped the resolutions would not be postponed. He could not conceive there was any indecorum in calling up the resolutions in the absence of the Chairman; and if his colleague had not called them up, he should. The period of the session was late, and no time could be lost.

Mr. Gregg said he should vote for the postponement, not because he thought it indecorous to proceed in this business in the absence of the Chairman; but for other reasons. One gentleman has addressed us as though we were on the eve of a war.

Mr. Elliot observed that he had said no such thing.

Mr. Gregg.—The proper authority has advised us that our affairs with one of the European Governments with whom we have differences are in a favorable train for accommodation. There can consequently be no such apprehension from this quarter. With the other country it appears that all differences are at present waived. I believe there is no information that the negotiation is going on, but there is no statement that that nation is preparing to attack us. What reason, then, is there for apprehending a greater danger at this period than existed several years ago? It was then said that we were to have a war with another nation, and we began to raise an army, and to repair our fortifications. But the alarm subsided. We are now again told that it is necessary to repair our fortifications. But I believe they have been suffered to go out of repair, because they will not answer the purposes for which they were intended. For my part, said Mr. G., if we are to be engaged in a war, I am willing to go all the length of our means. Some years ago when it was represented that danger existed, although I entertained a different opinion, I voted, out of deference to the opinions of others, for raising the Army and fortifications; and if I thought danger really existed at the present time, I would vote for the highest sum that has been named, if gentlemen could persuade me that it would answer the end contemplated.

But my greatest objection to the amendment is, that it is an attempt to alter our naval establishment in a side way. There can be no doubt but that it will entirely supersede the Navy Peace Establishment. It appears to have been thought at the last session that the number of vessels and seamen now in service, would be sufficient in time of peace. If a different opinion is now entertained, let the bill fixing the Peace Establishment be revised and altered; but, let us not in this side way give a power to the President at his discretion to call into service our whole naval force.

Mr. Lyon declared himself also in favor of the postponement. He believed they were in danger of a war, and ought to pursue far more energetic measures than those contemplated by the resolutions under consideration.

Mr. Smilie said if he really thought they were to have war, he should think seriously of defending the country. But he did not think that any of the gentlemen who had spoken had given any reasons for this apprehension. For his part, Mr. S. said, he did not see the least prospect of war with either of the nations alluded to. If, then, there was no danger of war, the only thing to be considered was what was required in a state of peace. Suppose our fleet was before the harbor of New York, and such an occurrence should take place as recently happened, was there not the greatest probability that a war would be the consequence; that our vessels would have attacked the Cambrian frigate, when war would have been inevitable? On this ground he was averse to arming the Navy. He was not, however, at the same time averse to putting our ports and harbors in a respectable state of defence. He believed, considering all circumstances, it would be best to postpone this subject to Monday week. He was averse to so distant a postponement as that named.

Mr. Lloyd acquiesced in this modification of his motion.

Mr. Mumford.—In the course of debate on this subject in Committee of the Whole, my friend from Maryland, whom I respect as much as any gentleman, and who fought your battles with honor to himself, and bears honorable scars in defending his country's rights, I am sure cannot be serious when he advised the inhabitants of our seaport towns at the moment of danger to fly to the mountains, and leave all to be despoiled by the invader. I have too good an opinion of that gentleman to think he will persist in such sentiments. He would, I am persuaded, be among the first defenders to fly to our assistance; and what would he exclaim if he were told on the road the inhabitants had fled to the mountains, without making the least effort to keep the enemy at bay until their friends in the country could come to their assistance! Gentlemen are very much mistaken if they think we want expensive establishments like a Gaeta or a Gibraltar; we only ask such protection as will secure our exposed seaports from the sudden surprise of an enemy.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, on my right, has observed, that we have no plan, and that it was impracticable to fortify New York. Another gentleman, from North Carolina, trusts he can find better methods of disposing of the surplus revenue than fortifying our ports and harbors. His reasons are indeed curious. He will not protect his crop, nor even buy a key to lock his strong box, because it will cost him a few dollars and cents. I will endeavor to show the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it can be defended against ships at least, if it cannot be from an army. Why we have not had a more ample plan offered by the War Department, in order that we might vote understandingly on this subject, I am unable to say. The reasons are best known to themselves.

I think it my bounden duty to lay before the House such imperfect information as I have been able to collect, and must therefore beg their indulgence while I communicate the information I have received from Lieutenant Colonel Williams, of the corps of artillerists and engineers, and President of the Military Philosophical Society of the United States, established under the auspices of the Government at West Point, State of New York; a man of solid learning, sound judgment, possessing a practical knowledge in the military art; and I feel a great satisfaction, after four and twenty years' acquaintance, to have it in my power to add my testimony, with numberless others, that he is worthy of having descended from the same stock of the late venerable sage and patriot, Dr. Franklin. He is a practical man, can execute the business he recommends, and whose plans we can safely rely on; there is nothing visionary about him. I will now beg leave to read such extracts from the transactions of that society, as appear applicable to the subject before us, and which, I think, in some measure, may be considered as an official document:

"West Point, December 20, 1806.

"Sir: In conformity to the enclosed resolutions of the United States Military Philosophical Society, I have the honor of laying before you a summary view of their transactions during the year 1806.

"It cannot be too often, nor too strongly reiterated, that the best means of preserving peace is to preserve undiminished the science of war, combining general principles with local circumstances, and modes of defence with strength of position. War, by modern improvement, has become a contest of skill rather than of force; for mere physical effort, whether produced by the natural prowess of individuals, or that resulting from number, would serve only to render the victory gained by a small but compact band of scientific soldiers so much the more brilliant.

"There undoubtedly exists, scattered throughout the United States, a great proportion of military science, which is fast sliding into oblivion, as the veterans of our Revolution are themselves descending to the tomb, and the instructive researches made by many of our countrymen in their European travels probably lie buried in their cabinets. To collect these treasures into one deposit, whence they can be occasionally drawn, as the exigencies of our country may require, is the great end for which the society was instituted. The importance of this object should be strongly impressed on the minds of Americans by the consideration that the Europeans, who might become their enemies, have been instructed in the most effectual, though the dearest of all schools—actual war; and as much as the nature of our Government is opposed to a standing army, so much ought we to preserve and make perfect the means of raising, organizing, and effectually directing the operations of a temporary one."

Before I proceed further with the extracts from this valuable work, it will be necessary to make a few preparatory remarks.

The system of fortifications recommended by the celebrated Vauban, as well as Coborn, are translated into all languages, and show they are applicable only to land batteries, citadels, &c., against the attacks of an army. I believe the honor of improvement in marine batteries has been reserved for the Marquis of Montalembert, and it is presumed justly so, as they combine solidity with durability, together with economy of men and money.

From high authority I am informed it has been in contemplation with the French Government to demolish all their old marine batteries, in order to erect new ones after the plan of those recommended by Montalembert. In the seven years' war, a British fleet was repulsed off the Isle de Aix, at the mouth of the river Charonte, on which is and was erected fortifications partly after the manner of Montalembert.

Extract from La Fortification Perpendiculaire of the Marquis of Montalembert: Translated by Jonathan Williams, Lieutenant Colonel of Engineers.

OF MARINE BATTERIES.

In many instances we have experienced the inefficiency of batteries placed along a coast. Hence has arisen a contempt for this kind of defence among military and naval officers; from the imperfection of such batteries as have been erected, a prejudice has been established that the fire of ships of war will always silence that of any batteries they can lie against, and that no seaport can be so defended as to prevent ships of war from entering it.

It does not, however, follow that this must always be the case, for we presume that such batteries have hitherto been badly constructed, and indifferently armed. Every kind of warlike attack or defence ought to be completely possessed of the whole force it is capable of: but if batteries are slightly constructed; if they are not furnished with a sufficient number of guns; if greater precaution is not taken with a battery that may be approached by ships of war as near as one hundred toises, than with one that cannot be approached within five hundred, the object of such batteries has not been understood, or these circumstances of position and exposure have not been considered.

The construction of a marine battery is not so simple a thing as may have been imagined; a variety of considerations should guide the engineer in forming his plan; the nature of the soil, its elevation, the various depths of the water, the direction of the flats, the courses of the channels, currents, &c., should be taken into consideration, and influence the position, the proportions, the form and composition of works of this kind; for it is not sufficient that they should be themselves indestructible by a maritime force, they should also possess the certain power of destroying any ships that come within their shot.

Therefore the construction of marine batteries ought to be guided by the following principles, viz:

First. Cannon ball begin to take effect at the distance of three hundred toises, eighteen hundred feet; therefore a ship would only waste her ammunition, if she were to attack a battery at a greater distance.

Second. It is established, in fortifications, that musketry cannot take effect at a greater distance than one hundred and fifty toises, nine hundred feet.

Third. Batteries on low ground, and near deep water, should not be en barbette, or without embrasures; barbette batteries being only proper in situations where large ships cannot approach near to them or when there can be but few guns mounted, and of very heavy metal, and when it is necessary to point in all directions, by turning the carriages on their pivots; but such batteries are much exposed when heavy ships can approach within musket shot.

Fourth. In all cases where an enemy has an essential object to accomplish, and batteries are designed to oppose his progress, it is better to have none, unless they are made stronger than the ships they are to repel; and we think this kind should be made wholly of mason work.

Fifth. We would, however, establish certain degrees in this respect; for it must be considered that to defend the entrance of a port of any great importance, more powerful means must be used than to defend any small harbor, since it is certain that the enemy's attack will be in proportion to the magnitude of the enterprise.

Sixth. The embrasures of seacoast batteries should be sufficiently wide to allow the axis of the bore of the gun, (which we will call the axis of the embrasure,) to form a horizontal angle of twenty-five degrees. Now the tangent of twenty-five degrees, to a radius of three hundred toises in length, is one hundred and forty toises, which determines the space commanded by half the embrasure to this distance. In like manner when the ship shall be in a perpendicular line at one hundred and fifty toises distance, (the length of musket shot,) the half embrasure will discover a space of seventy toises.

Seventh. Let us suppose a coast that is in a right line, as well as the flats under water which determine the edge of the channel in the distance of three hundred toises from the coast. In this case, supposing the bow of the ship to be in the channel, at less than one hundred and forty toises from the axis of the first embrasure, it will be seen at that instant along the side of the embrasure at three hundred and thirty-one toises distance, that being the secant of this angle, to a radius of three hundred toises; then this would be the greatest distance at which the battery should fire.

Eighth. It is clear from the foregoing, that when a ship is sailing along a coast which, as well as its battery, is in a right line, it will be exposed from the first moment it is within one hundred and forty toises of the axis of the first embrasure, until it shall be one hundred and forty toises from the last, in addition to the length of the ship, in every point of that line; and, supposing the battery to have twenty-four pieces, and the ship to have thirty toises in length, she will have to pass through three hundred and forty-six toises of constant fire, before she can be out of cannon shot.

Ninth. The width of the merlons leaves no space that cannot be seen at the distance mentioned. The lines of fire from embrasures that are three toises, or eighteen feet distant from each other, and with an opening not twenty degrees, cross about eight toises and three feet from the summit of their angle; deducting therefrom the thickness of the parapet, there will be left five toises from the exterior part, for the distance at which the fire crosses. When the summit of the angles of each embrasure are but nine feet distant from each other, and the opening at the exterior subtends an angle of fifty degrees, the lines of fire will cross at nine feet six inches from the summit of the angle; deducting from this six feet for the thickness of the wall, and the distance from the centre of the cannon's motion, there will remain but two feet eight inches for the distance from the exterior part of the wall to the point of intersection of the crossing fires. From the foregoing it appears impossible that even a boat could escape with impunity.

Tenth. If a ship were to keep out of the fire of such battery, her distance must be more than three hundred and thirty toises, as we have shown. Now, at this distance no ship, not even a fleet could injure a battery of this description to any important degree; and in case there were mortars in the battery, the advantage of such a cannonade would probably be on the side of the battery.

Eleventh. But if the channel were at one hundred and fifty toises from the battery, it would be necessary to remedy by its construction the disadvantage to which it is exposed by its position. This is the great object of the art of fortification. In such a case the tangent of the angle of twenty-five degrees would only be seventy, and its secant one hundred and sixty-five toises. A ship, then, by getting springs on its cables, in a position between two embrasures, might be out of the sight of either, and, without receiving one shot, might attack the post with its whole broadside. It might advance close to the battery, and, by the musketry from its tops, might clear the ramparts of every man. This has been the case in all those instances where forts have been so easily destroyed by ships of war, and it is this which we flatter ourselves we have completely remedied in the manner hereafter explained.

Twelfth. Every battery which is liable to be approached by large ships at the distance of one hundred and fifty toises should be built entirely of mason work and casemated. It should be casemated to be protected from the fire of musketry from the ships' tops, and of mason work to resist the force of artillery, also to permit a nearer position of the guns, and a greater angle to the embrasures.

Thirteenth. In general, marine batteries should be terminated in circular form, so that there may be no point within the reach of cannon shot, where a ship might ride without being exposed to their fire; this, however, is not necessary on the land side.

Fourteenth. Such batteries should have several tier of guns, like the ship against which they are to act, and the guns should be as near to each other as they are in a ship of war; they should be plentifully supplied with covered musketry, in points where they can be approached within musket shot, and then the ships and not the battery would have the most to fear from an attack.

Fifteenth. In short, every battery should have a defence peculiar to itself. It should not be susceptible of being, as it were, seized by the throat; its resistance should be in every direction from which an attack is possible, and it should have an imposing artillery on the land as well as on the sea side.

Note by the Translator.

These principles are displayed by an annexed plan, elevation, and section. In the plan, two towers, with the regular bases, are connected by a curtain at a distance from centre to centre of sixty toises, with lines of fire from the towers in every direction by sea and land, while on the latter side it is completely defended by all the known rules of the art of fortification; the towers are covered by a circular parapet, which is bomb proof, and, while it commands all around, it protects all below.

This plan is upon too small a scale to show the openings for the musketry in the elevation; the number of cannon in a given space may be counted, and it will be thereby seen that, in ordinary batteries of one line, when the distance from each gun is eighteen feet, for every shot such a battery could fire, these towers and curtain would fire six, occuping only the same space of ground, and this without counting the cannon that might be mounted on the top of the whole. Behind every aperture for small arms is an apartment for two or more soldiers, so that this work is at once a fort and barracks; the section displays the interior, with the arches in profile, according to the lines of vision in perspective, and the circular apertures above give free passage to the smoke, which has ample room to spread itself among the arches. The representation of a broken partition discovers the soldiers' apartment. A superior figure describes a detached tower.

The works of the Marquis of Montalembert, (ten volumes quarto,) it is believed, have not yet appeared in English, and the copy from which the foregoing was translated, is probably the only one in American hands. They were imported for the use of the Military Academy, and make a valuable portion of its library.

I now come to the grand question—What will be the cost of this plan of fortification? Montalembert calculates the whole at 2,500 cubic toises solid masonry, which, reduced to our measure, comes very near 25,000 perches—say, that about $160,000 will be sufficient to build a fortification capable of firing one hundred and twenty guns at each discharge upon one and the same object. It cannot be denied that marine batteries, constructed on these principles, must unite the greatest advantages. The four tier of the courtine, which unite the towers, contain 96 pieces of cannon; so that, by including the fire from the towers, a passing ship would receive 120 shot at every discharge throughout the whole space it would have to pass in a right line; the extent of the space, if the ship were at 400 yards, would be 360 yards; if at 600 yards distance, the ship would be exposed to such a fire during the time of sailing 512 yards. The passage, then, between two such batteries, one on each side of the Narrows—that is, between the Reef and Signal hill, is but about 1,300 or 1,400 yards, so that, coming with bows in, and sailing through, a ship would be exposed at once to both batteries, of 240 shot at each discharge—the men all the while covered. It must also be considered that no more disciplined troops would be required than merely to take care of the place and keep it in order, for the militia artillery companies could answer any supply of men wanted, when fighting became necessary. This work will be better than any that has hitherto been executed, and if it should prove to be such as we are assured it will be, the grand desideratum of fortifying our ports with great efficacy combined with great economy will be gained.

It is evident from the plan of such a work, which I have seen in the original, that from a gun which can be fired from the requisite space in any fortification now existing in this country, without extending that space, and, of course, without additional foundation, six guns may be fired. That is, the guns are twice as near to each other, and instead of one there are three tiers, all bomb proof, arched over each embrasure, or rather port hole, and capable of containing a complement of men all under cover. In going over a hasty translation of part of this work, some inaccuracies may have occurred, but the observations are believed to be substantially correct.

This plan is presumed to be solid, durable, and proportionate to the end desired; but it cannot be carried into effect without money; and as I have always understood money was the sinews of war, and as I am not disposed to sit down quietly with folded arms, despise my enemy, and cry peace, peace, when there is no certainty how long it may continue, I am for adopting a broad and liberal policy, by extending the arm of national defence throughout the whole Union, and inspire our fellow-citizens with confidence in their Government and in themselves, by knowing when and where their arms are to be found; and being prepared for war, will be the sure means of permanently securing your peace. I do, therefore, hope this House will exercise their own sober judgment, and then I am persuaded they will be convinced that the sum of twenty thousand dollars, filled up in this bill, for the fortifications of all our exposed ports and harbors is totally inadequate to the desired object—I mean all the ports, because some gentlemen seem to carry the idea that the appropriation is for the city of New York alone. I mention this circumstance, supposing it might be the idea of other gentlemen, I was advocating for that city exclusively. Sir, I disdain such a narrow policy. I have come here to promote the best interests of this Union, by pursuing magnanimous and liberal views, and in defending our seacoasts, ports, and harbors, do conceive I am carrying that object into effect, together with such other general measures as may appear proper to pursue, and which the exigencies of our common country may require.

Shall it be said, and go abroad in our nation, that the Congress of the United States appropriated $20,000 to build a custom-house in New Orleans, and only $30,000 in defence of fourteen hundred miles of seacoast, on which are situated her most populous cities, for the reception of the surplus productions of her soil; and that the farmers, the planters, and the cultivators of that soil would not afford protection to their own property deposited in those places for safe-keeping and a market? To me it is incomprehensible, unless I should indulge the idea that the enemies of your peace and tranquillity have, by their slander and impositions upon the well-meaning citizens of the interior of the nation, represented the inhabitants of your cities as actuated by sinister views, and that they only wanted jobs to make money; nothing can be more illiberal, they are friends from choice, and from one of the strongest of all motives, the mutual interest they have in the prosperity of each other's agriculture and commerce. Why all this apathy, and why recommend flying to the mountains for protection? Is it in contemplation to abandon the seacoast altogether? What will this finally end in? I am seriously apprehensive of its ultimate consequences. Is it in the power of any man to calculate? Is it not more than human foresight can predict? Is our whole Atlantic coast and its inhabitants to be abandoned to their fate? Do gentlemen think they have got no feelings nor any rights? You may refuse to hear them, and neglect to protect them, until you alienate their affections from the nation. They are conscious of having performed all their duties as faithful citizens of the Union. What can be the cause of this distinction?

I do hope this House will pursue a broad and liberal policy, and exercise their own judgment in promoting what they may think for the best interests of this Union, without being fettered and shackled with those things called estimates, sometimes calling for enormous sums, and at others you are left in the dark, and must vote without having the requisite facts before you. We represent freemen, and I do hope we shall exercise our Constitutional rights in adopting such measures as we may think proper. There is nothing I more ardently desire, than to see the chain of this Union strengthened and brightened more and more; and hope we shall not be charged with having neglected to keep the polish bright. Shall it be said the ninth Congress suffered it to corrode? I hope not. I am sure they will not suffer any such imputation, and I do trust in the magnanimity of this House, that they will agree to fill this blank with such a sum as will give us solid and permanent defence of all the exposed ports on our Atlantic coast. Conceiving it the duty of this nation to weigh well these facts, which have come with irresistible force on my own mind, I hope the House will excuse my taking up so much of their time in discharging those duties. I shall take another opportunity of making further observations. In the meanwhile, I do hope the motion to postpone will not obtain.

When Mr. M. had concluded—

Mr. Elliot said he should not have risen again, had not his remarks been misunderstood. He had not said that he expected war during the recess. He had only intimated the expectation that the moment of danger would occur in the recess. He was willing to go further, and to say that he believed the moment of danger had already arrived. He believed the greatest danger of war now existed, and that it could not be avoided without national degradation. He said he had spoken of no secret documents, nor of a secret Cabinet, if any such existed; but he alluded to publications in the newspapers, from which we knew that we were under the necessity of making a treaty with Spain, under the dictation of France, or of going to war with both those nations. Was it not then a time of the greatest danger? He had, however, but little expectation, though the national honor required war, that we should be engaged in war. On the contrary, he believed that the old maxim of millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute, was about to be reversed.

Mr. Fisk.—With the gentleman just sat down, I apprehend there is some danger when gentlemen are so alarmed and bewildered in their imaginations as entirely to lose sight of the question of postponement before the House, and to go into the general principles and policy of fortifications, and when a mere question of policy is found to draw forth such a discussion. I did not expect, on such an occasion, that any gentleman would have so lost himself in the mazes of fancy as to make himself believe that he saw things which did not exist, and predict events which no rational man believes will ever take place. My colleague has said that we must suffer national disgrace, or have a war with Spain and France; that we dare not deny this and give the people the information we possess. I wish to know what information we have to give? I wish gentlemen to point it out. Has anything transpired, like that alluded to by my colleague, to warrant his assertion? Nothing of the kind has; there is no probability of war; appearances now are not so unfavorable as they were one year ago. To maintain peace with other nations, it is necessary that we should treat them with decent respect, and have some kind of confidence in them; there ought on our part to be manifested a disposition to keep peace. Is this the way to show such a confidence? To declare we are on the eve of a war while we are in the midst of a negotiation, which promises a happy one? I see no benefit in such observations; I discard them. Gentlemen seem to think fortifications of such importance that, if erected, they would protect the country from war, their ships from plunder, their seamen from insult and imprisonment. If fortifications could answer the good purposes stated, it would be proper to make them. But has experience decided in their favor? Look at the old world; let us profit by their examples. The nations of Europe have gone into extensive plans of fortifications and armaments. Have not war and devastation spread themselves from one end to the other of that continent? Have fortifications protected them? Have they not, on the contrary, been among the causes of the devastation and misery in that country? There is more reason for them in the old world than here. There every nation is surrounded by enemies and jealous of its neighbors, while here we are divided from the old world and powerful rivals by an immense ocean. When we were weak, and struggled through imminent danger to gain our independence, we then relied on the yeomanry of our country. In 1793 Great Britain insulted our flag and threatened us with the hostilities of the Indians. Did we then avert the calamity by fortifying or building navies? No, other measures were resorted to and proved successful; since which it has so happened that we have experienced the blessings of peace and happiness beyond any nation on earth. I will ask whether we are in more danger now than in 1793? If not, where is the necessity of those expensive measures?

In 1798 France threatened us with war. We did not then carry on fortifications to any great extent. We have been progressing ever since in strength and numbers, and yet we are now called on to fortify when we are not threatened by any nation.

I presume the great body of the yeomanry, whenever their rights are invaded, or danger offers, will be ready to meet and repel it. Formerly we depended upon them, and we were not disappointed. I believe, if danger were now to present itself, we should not be disappointed.

Gentlemen say we ought to inspire our people with confidence. Is this the way, by exciting a clamor of imaginary danger, and telling them they can only rely on fortifications?

Mr. F. said he would have no objection to ordering two or three of the public vessels to New York, where, in case of danger, they might be manned by their own seamen. But he did not see at present the necessity of the measures asked, or the existence of the danger pointed out. He was in favor of the postponement.

Mr. Van Cortlandt said this subject was highly important, as it respected the safety of the country. He did not wish the measures of defence entirely confined to fortifications. They had a number of vessels of war, which he thought might be advantageously used as circumstances might require. Let then the sum that is proposed be appropriated, and let the President use it as he pleases, either in gunboats or fortifications. He was against the postponement; that the sense of the House might be tried on the motion he had the honor of submitting.

Mr. Thomas said, if the motion to postpone was persisted in, he should be under the necessity of asking the yeas and nays, as it went to involve the main proposition. He could not, he said, tax the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Lloyd) with a design to defeat this measure in an unfair way, as he had declared himself against it in any shape in which it could be presented to the House. Gentlemen, however, would recollect that this measure had been recommended by the President at the opening of the session—that it had been referred to a select committee who had not reported until sometime in January—that it lay on the table in consequence of the indisposition of the chairman of this committee—and that after more than two-thirds of the session had passed it was at last taken up for consideration. Under these circumstances, though the measure is yet in a perfectly immature state, and when there was but four weeks of the session remaining, a motion is made to postpone it for half the remaining time. Could gentlemen look at these circumstances and not see that the motion was evidently intended to defeat the whole measure?

Mr. Lloyd said he would most cheerfully join the gentleman from New York in calling for the yeas and nays. It was never his wish to vote in conclave, and if every man in America were present, he should speak and vote as he then did. It was an unpleasant thing for him to be again under the necessity of assigning his reasons for this motion. His colleague had reported the resolutions under consideration, and had voted for every part of them. If, therefore, gentlemen would consent to wait until he should return, they would have one more vote for them. It was obvious that this would be the strangest reason on earth, for making his motion, if his object were to defeat the resolutions. His primary motive for the motion had been to give his colleague an opportunity of vindicating the arguments he had urged on this subject. Mr. L. said the arguments of gentlemen in opposition had furnished him with additional motives to postpone the subject. They tell us that war is impending. For his own part he saw no reason for this opinion; but a short delay might throw some light on this point, and might, if such an opinion appeared to be well founded, induce those at present opposed to the resolutions to vote for them. If the existence of danger could be satisfactorily shown to him, he would go as far any man in defending the country. But without such proof, he would never consent to be lavish of thousands.

Mr. L. said that he did not pretend to possess any military knowledge. He was willing to allow Colonel Williams all the merit claimed for him. So far as respected the principle of a fortification, his opinions were no doubt correct. But, allowing his premises, was he to infer that the United States were competent to fortify a coast of a thousand miles in extent? If it were intended to fortify the whole coast, he would ask where were the funds? Because we will not defend the whole coast, are we to be told that the people are not protected? Because we do not accomplish that which is impossible, are we to be charged with a disregard to the interests of the nation?—when every man knows that it is impossible to defend the seacoast without a vast standing army and an enormous expense, which the nation is not now able to bear? So far from the omission to do this alienating the affections of the people from the Government, he thought that the measures urged by gentlemen would be the most effectual means of alienating them.

Mr. Masters.—The Representatives from New York have not contended for partial appropriations, as many gentlemen seem to suppose. They contend for a much larger sum to be appropriated than is now filled in the blank of the resolution, to enable the President to begin and complete permanent works for fortifications at the most important and defenceless places. The last session of Congress a large number of petitions was presented to this House relative to fortifying the port and harbor of New York; the Legislature of that State instructed their Senators and requested their Representatives to use their best endeavors to induce Congress to fortify and defend the port and harbor of that city; which must be admitted is in a defenceless situation, and can be approached by water from two different points, and laid under contribution by a single frigate. The decision of this House was then against us. The applications from the city of New York have been renewed; almost innumerable petitions are before you, and what are we told? Rather than fortify, gentlemen would sooner see our citizens flee to the mountains for protection. Yes, sir, like the Arabs; behold the picture! 70,000 men, women, and children, in one city, fleeing in confusion from their homes. Never, never, let it again be said that Americans must flee before an enemy for the want of the protection of your Government. If they must flee, let it be at the point of the bayonet, with force opposed to force.

It is painful to me to see the disposition of this House so hostile to everything that looks like a systematic policy of permanent national defence. The additional sum of $20,000, added to the unexpended balance of the last year, is so contemptible a sum, that it has the appearance of ridicule on your petitioners.

Was there ever a civilized nation under heaven, in the same circumstances, who so completely neglected to fortify their principal places and most vulnerable points? We are constantly insulted and constantly in treaty with other nations, year after year, in order to settle differences and preserve peace. Yet we pursue no efficient measures for fortification and defence. The most part of our seaport towns from Georgia to Maine are liable to be laid in ashes by the most insignificant force. If you expect to enjoy your independence and liberty, you must protect that independence and liberty; if you enjoy inalienable rights, you must protect and defend those rights, or the enemies of our republican institutions will ridicule your Government, and laugh at your weakness; which, indeed, they have already done. I hope that neither the position of this House nor the Gods will invite traitors, conspirators, pirates, and picaroons, to glory and fortune, at the expense of the interest dignity, and honor of this nation.

The report of the Secretary of War would seem to carry the idea, as though great things were doing for New York; but this is to be tested by the expenditure and appropriation. Some gentlemen say that the Secretary of War is the proper organ and source of information on this subject, and he does not want any further appropriation for fortifications. If this is his opinion, or that $20,000 can be useful, or answer any valuable purpose, or that the nation ought not to be fortified; then I say it is time, high time, that the good old patriot retire from the War Department. I say it, and as an independent Representative, have a right to say it, for such is my opinion. I am for a regular system of national defence, the Secretary of War to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Van Rensselaer.—I am against the motion for postponement. Although I have no reason to believe that any observations I can offer will alter a vote given in the Committee of the Whole, I consider it a duty incumbent on me to deliver my sentiments on the general question now before you. The sum of $20,000 has been voted for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States, and $250,000 for building gunboats. The peculiar situation of New York requires a speedy decision—not that I calculate on the present appropriation as an object by which it will in the least be benefitted, but I think it of the first importance the citizens should know the fate of their application to Congress for an appropriation adequate to fortifying the port "against national hostility and predatory incursions," a port that renders to your Treasury above one-fourth of the whole revenue of the United States. The friends of this measure are peculiarly unfortunate, whenever this question is discussed on the floor of Congress, from the manner in which it is treated. For they are told, that it is the height of folly to fortify, inasmuch as the sum requisite will be enormous, and after all an army can land and subdue the fortresses. If we ask for fortifications that will inspire confidence and render our city secure against the attack of a picaroon, we are told, by the opposers of fortifications, that there is a profound peace, and no danger to be apprehended. If I understand anything respecting our public relations, this proposition is fallacious and dangerous. For so threatening is the aspect of our affairs, that the whole nation is alive with anxiety about the result. But let us admit for a moment that we have no cause of apprehension from abroad. Are there no other considerations that merit attention, and call for a generous appropriation towards securing the city of New York against an attack on the property of its citizens and its banks? Have we not within less than twelve months seen an extraordinary armament fitted out in our ports to invade some of the Spanish provinces in South America? I mean, sir, the Miranda armament; and have we not been told from the highest authority, recently, that an enterprise has been formed, and movements made either to sever the Union, or invade Mexico from your own territory, and by your own citizens? An enterprise, and movements that have excited and continue to excite such great sensibility within these walls, as well as through the Union, which if any person had predicted eighteen months ago, he would have been called a madman. And will gentlemen persist in saying that it is folly for us to guard New York against possible and probable events? What is the object of Miranda and Burr's expeditions but money? What gives life to their armaments but the dollars of Mexico and the wealth of Peru? Can any man suppose that Burr, or Miranda, could find followers in an expedition to the inhospitable regions of Cape Horn? Would it surprise you more, Mr. Speaker, to hear that a set of renegado Americans, or blacks from the island of Hayti, had laid New York under contribution with an armament (in its present defenceless state) than that Miranda should attempt to conquer South America with one armed ship, and Burr sever the Union, or invade Mexico by your own citizens? Notwithstanding the armament has failed, and the expedition is crushed, yet, sir, I undertake to say, that our fears are not groundless as to the possibility of plundering the city of New York, should an armed force have the audacity to attempt it. Among other arguments offered against fortifying New York, we are told by an honorable gentleman from North Carolina

(Mr. Holland) "that the severity of warfare has been much meliorated, and that cities are not burnt by shipping, or laid under contribution." To this I reply that every seaport town in Europe is well fortified, not with a view alone to resist the fleet of an enemy, but to prevent a corsair or picaroon from annoying or molesting them. We hear frequently something said on this floor about a survey of the port of New York, and the estimates of the cost of the contemplated works. I know that a survey of the port and harbor of New York has been made the last Summer, and that it is to be found in the War Office. Why it has not been laid before Congress is not for me at present to explain, but it is sufficient to say that we have no official information about the soundings of the channel from the sea to the city, or about the elevated ground and islands that may be the most suitable sites for fortifications, and the money necessary to erect them. I contend, sir, that new works ought to be erected, and that the fortifications on Governor's Island are inadequate to defence. Fort Jay, on that island, is a square fort composed of a sodded rampart and wooden parapet. Of the front next to New York, not one gun through any of its embrasures could hit a ship on East river, and the whole courtine could fire no where without endangering the city, for this fort no doubt originally was intended by the British to awe the city. The rampart is merely a bank of sand, and the wooden parapet is a mass of rotten timber. The last Summer a skilful engineer has enclosed the whole, and to take off the destructive fire of the courtine towards the city a ravelin has been executed which now gives two directions, one towards the East river, and the other ranging the front of the city battery towards the entrance of the North river. Will it be said, sir, that a work like this is adequate for defence? But here we are told by an honorable gentleman from South Carolina, that the sum of $20,000 is an ample sum to fortify the ports and harbors in the United States for the year 1807, inasmuch as $102,000 remain unexpended of $150,000 appropriated last year, added to $70,000 in the general appropriation bill. Here I trust the gentleman will permit me to correct him. The seventy thousand dollars have already been expended for the Army, and as to the $102,000 said to be in the Treasury, we find, in a letter dated 12th December last, from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the committee appointed "on so much of the President's message as relates to the repairs of fortifications, and to the further protection of our ports, towns, and rivers," that the fortifications intended to have been erected at Charleston, South Carolina, had not been commenced, owing to a disappointment in fixing the proper site, and that at New Orleans the same disappointment had occasioned the same delay in the erection of works there. And can it be said that these new fortifications will leave one cent unexpended out of the $102,000? No, sir, the sum will be found inadequate. And suppose the whole is not laid out there, does it follow that the overplus will be laid out at New York? The appropriation was general for all the ports and harbors. If the sum of $20,000 voted in Committee of the Whole, for the current year, were laid out on Fort Jay, it would only enable your engineer to do as he has done—patch up.

If you do not mean to render the place inaccessible by a large naval force, three to four hundred thousand dollars is the least sum requisite, provided you mean to erect one or two additional works on the islands near the channel as you approach the city, to guard the place "against predatory incursion." Last year the Executive of the State of New York addressed the President of the United States on this subject; the Legislature of the State instructed their members on this floor; the corporation of the city of New York and its citizens, without distinction of party, petitioned Congress to fortify their port and harbor. What did you do? Little or nothing. This session, the corporation, with the citizens, have renewed their application. Is it to be presumed, sir, that the mayor, aldermen, and common council of a city like New York, who are generally composed of men of talents, and respectability of character in society, would ask for a grant of money to fortify, unless it was necessary and practicable? Need we confine ourselves to the State of New York for an opinion on that subject? No, sir, I find that the President, in his Message at the commencement of the session, says, "that a further appropriation will be necessary for repairing fortifications already established, and the erection of such other works as may have real effect in obstructing the approach of an enemy to our seaport towns, or their remaining before them."

I entreat gentlemen to notice this part of the Message, which I hope will have some weight, if the memorials have none. But, sir, I almost despond in the apprehension that this session will close as the former did—nothing done for New York.

We hear gentlemen from the South say, we cannot consent to lavish the treasure of the Union in fortifying your port and harbor; others say that it will do no good. This, sir, is language that we understand, and language which leaves us no room to hope that anything effectual will be done. But, let me tell gentlemen that this conduct will have a more serious effect than they are aware of. The States to the South have, for a series of years past, had every grant of money that was called for; even six thousand dollars have been appropriated for a horse-path, which is more than New York can expect out of the $20,000 you mean to appropriate for the current year for fortifications.

Can gentlemen be serious when they say this is correct? The citizens of New York say that they cannot, in submissive silence, suppress the feelings which arise out of their condition. If they could, they would be more or less than men. Strong in the consciousness of right, and in the sentiment of freedom; conscious that they have performed towards the Union all the duties of faithful citizens, they claim in return, the performance of that great duty of government, protection; deny them this, and they will have great reason to believe, that nothing but war or insurrection will make you go.

When New York entered into the compact with the Union, her abundant revenue afforded her ample means of defence. She had not then occasion to ask any of her sister States for assistance; but for promoting the general welfare, and relying implicitly on the protection of the Union, she yielded her means of defence, confident that it would be afforded to her. In this I am sorry to say that she has been disappointed. The supreme executive and legislative councils, with all classes of citizens, have implored your protection; have warned you of your engagements, and demanded their fulfilment. To all this you have turned a deaf ear. You have not only refused their prayer, but have sported with their anxieties and ridiculed their apprehensions.

The question was then taken on postponing the resolution to Monday week, and disagreed to—yeas 40, nays 76, as follows:

COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. Early, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred the petition of sundry inhabitants of the towns of Stonington and Groton in the State of Connecticut, and the petition of sundry inhabitants of Pawcatuck, in the State of Rhode Island, made the following report:

The petitioners pray that a new collection district may be formed, to include Stonington and Groton, in the State of Connecticut, and Pawcatuck, in the State of Rhode Island, together with certain shores and waters adjacent; and that Stonington may be made the port of entry thereof.

This is an application which, if granted, will lead to an invasion of a principle in the arrangement of the collection districts of the United States, heretofore so tenaciously adhered to, that but a single exception has ever been made to it. The principle is to avoid forming a district out of different States. The exception is in the annexation of the towns of Kittery and Berwick, in the State of Massachusetts, to the district of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, leaving, however, vessels bound to the former places the option of making their entry at York, the nearest port of entry in the former State. Such an option will be indispensable in every case of the kind, to avoid an infraction of that provision in the Constitution, which declares that vessels bound to or from one State, shall not be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another; and the necessity for such an option it is that raises, in the opinion of the committee, an insuperable objection to the present application, as being embarrassing to the officers and hazardous to the security of the revenue.

The committee have not been able to discover the reasons which dictated the arrangement in the solitary case above-mentioned, but they cannot consider it otherwise than as a dangerous precedent. They submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialists ought not to be granted.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House then adjourned.

Thursday, February 5.

Mr. Lewis, from the committee to whom was referred, on the second ultimo, the Message of the President of the United States, of the fifteenth of December last, communicating a report of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings at the city of Washington, presented a bill making appropriations for finishing the south wing of the Capitol, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole tomorrow.

Mr. Early, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to the bill for surveying the coast of the United States, reported their agreement to the same, in which the House concurred—ayes 58.

The amendments extend the survey to the Gulf of Mexico, and appropriate $50,000 for the same.

On motion of Mr. Stanton, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be erected, in suitable places, on the margin of the ocean, at his discretion, not exceeding —— arsenals and docks, for the accommodation and speedy repairing of public armed ships and vessels that may be rendered unfit for service by gales of wind, or in action with the enemies of the United States; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise:

The House proceeded to consider the said resolution and the same being twice read, was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the report of a committee on fortifying our ports and harbors.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Van Cortlandt, which was disagreed to—ayes 51, noes 54.

The question then recurred on filling the blank in the 2nd resolution with "$250,000," for building fifty gunboats.

Mr. Mumford.—I hope a majority of this House will agree to strike out the whole resolution respecting gunboats, with a view to appropriate that money to solid and durable fortifications. I was opposed to it in Committee of the Whole. I did then, and do now consider, that there is no necessity for any more gunboats. There are, in my opinion, a sufficient number already for the Southern sections of the Union, for which places they appear to be only adapted, except in a very few places to the North, where there is shoal water. They may answer a very good purpose in shoal water, but are inadequate for the defence of your ports and harbors to the north of the New Jersey shore; and I very much doubt, whether, in a gale of wind, they would not even sink at their mooring at the entrance of either of the harbors of Portsmouth, Salem, Plymouth, Newport, or New York.

It has been asserted that this was an electioneering scheme, and that as soon as our Spring elections were over, no more would be thought of it, until the next election. I wish, sir, to put this question to eternal rest, by stating the plain matter of fact. Why, sir, it has been considered of so serious a nature in its consequences, and of so much importance, that the Legislature of the State of New York, in their last session, did enter into formal resolutions, instructing their delegation, in both branches of the Legislature of the United States, to use their utmost endeavors for the defence and protection of the port and harbor of New York—the whole State is alive on this subject—and the memorials now lying on your table from the Mayor and Corporation of that city, together with the petitions from the citizens of all political parties, tend to one and the same object, protection to their persons and to their property—there is not, there cannot be any dissenting voice with them on this subject.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania on my right says, he would not defend your Atlantic shores if it was to be done with ships of war. I have too good an opinion of that gentleman's patriotism, to indulge even the idea that he can possibly be serious, to suffer his friends and fellow-citizens on these shores to be forsaken and abandoned to their fate. I will assure that gentleman, if his part of the country were attacked by any enemy, foreign or domestic, from the Western country, or anywhere else, I will vouch that he shall have every protection and aid New York can afford.

Mr. Smilie said he was willing to divide the appropriation; to apply $150,000 to the building of gunboats, and $100,000 to the fortification of New York.

Mr. Thomas observed that, to get at this course, it would be proper in the first instance to disagree to the proposition to fill it with $250,000.

Mr. Cook hoped they would disagree to this proposition. He believed that $250,000 was a larger sum than was wanted for the fair trial of the experiment whether gunboats would be efficacious. They were not, he added, held in much repute in the Eastern country,

The filling the blank with $250,000 was disagreed to—ayes 4.

Mr. Thomas moved to fill the blank with one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. J. Randolph hoped this motion would not be agreed to. He was too unwell to go far into the subject, but he would ask the House whether they were acting with their accustomed caution and distrust, where the expenditure of public money was involved? He thought not. If he were convinced that the expenditure of $150,000, or even $1,500,000 would answer the proposed end, he would cheerfully give it. But, as had been observed, the system of gunboats was matter of experiment, and if they should eventually turn out good for nothing, the House would be of opinion that they had vested as large a capital in a worthless project as would be deemed necessary. He would not undertake to say they were good for nothing—far from it. But there was no information before the House which entitled him to say they were good for much. When you compare, said Mr. R., the lavish appropriation made on this subject in Committee of the Whole, and view the economy this House always practises on every branch of expenditure, relative to the regular army and navy, looking with an eagle eye on every dollar before they part with it—it surprises me to see them voting away hundreds of thousands of dollars for a species of vessel, which, in all human probability, may be used for river craft in a few years. One thing has been ascertained. Ships of war are defensive and offensive, too, but the House will vote no money for an addition to them. I do not censure them for it; but if they will not appropriate for objects, the physical powers of which are ascertained, why vote the public treasure by handfuls for vessels, the powers of which have never been tried? Let the experiment be made, and, if it succeeds, let us appropriate liberally; but, till then, let us not vote more money than has been already appropriated. I believe there is one situation in which they may be useful—in the Mississippi. I wish, however, not to be understood as speaking as a man of science on this business. I only wish some evidence of the value of this machine, before I vest so large a capital in it. I hope, therefore, the blank will not be filled with $150,000. As it has been stated, I think it will be extremely disproportionate to vote $20,000 for the fortification of all our harbors, and $150,000 for gunboats.

Mr. Stanton said that, in the last French war, a system of this kind had been adopted, and had proved highly beneficial. In a calm, two gunboats would sink a frigate, and if they were obliged to retreat, they could run out of danger at any time.

Mr. J. Randolph rose for information. He wished some gentleman acquainted with the subject, would inform the House what number of seamen would be requisite to man these gunboats in case they should be built; not merely to sail them along the coast, but to fight them; and what number of seamen would be required for other vessels. Where could be the use of building, if it were not intended to man them? Was it not evident that, in a few years, they would rot, and the money expended upon them be lost? He said he might be wrong, and he hoped if they were built, he should be proved to be so.

Mr. Smilie said, it was true that he was neither a military nor a naval man, nor did he pretend to say that gunboats were the best means of defence. The proper departments, however, ought to be the best acquainted on this subject, and they were of opinion that this species of defence was necessary. Whether they were right or wrong, he would not pretend to say; but he would observe, that the Secretary of the Navy had informed them that the President had deemed it expedient to authorize the building of sixty additional gunboats. Now, whether the President or the Secretary of the Navy was competent to a correct decision on this point, he did not know. This was, however, clearly their opinion. He did know, however, that it was their duty to provide the necessary means; and if they granted but half the sum required by the President, it appeared to him it would be descending as low as was proper under existing circumstances.

Mr. Elmer said that, under existing circumstances, he was opposed to appropriating 150,000 dollars to building additional gunboats. The House had determined that they would not authorize the President to man those already built. It appeared to him very bad economy to suffer the public vessels to lay in dock, and to build other vessels, the utility of which was not ascertained. There might be situations in which gunboats would be useful, but had they not enough of them already? If it should be ascertained that thirty or forty gunboats should be wanted for any particular purpose, Mr. E. said it might be prudent to authorize their erection. He said, he had been in favor of giving authority to the President to man and equip the armed vessels and gunboats. The House had, however, refused this. If, then, they would not authorize the President, whatever the emergency, to man the present vessels, why build additional vessels?

Mr. Holland was opposed to filling the blank with so large a sum. He was also opposed to giving authority to man the armed vessels. The nation was in a state of profound peace, and he did not see that these vessels would have anything to do. He was opposed to this appropriation on another ground. He believed, whenever the necessity should occur, they would be able in one, two, or three months, to build as many gunboats as would be wanted.

Mr. Gregg said, from the discussions which had taken place, and the votes of the House, there might be a propriety in postponing the business for the purpose of obtaining information. For his own part, he was willing to acknowledge that he was altogether in the dark. He did not know in what situation gunboats would be useful, or the number of men required to man them; nor did he know whether land fortifications were necessary, in connexion with them, to defend the port of New York. Before he could act understandingly on the subject, it was necessary for him to have this information. Some gentlemen say that gunboats will answer valuable purposes, while there are others of opinion that there are so few places, on the coast of the United States, where they will answer, that a small number of them will be sufficient. I believe, said Mr. G., under these circumstances, that it will be best to postpone the further consideration of the subject, and, in the meantime, call on the Secretary of the Navy to say at what points gunboats will answer, together with the number of them necessary, and on the Secretary at War to say whether he is in possession of any plan for the protection of New York, together with its expense, and the number of men required. It will be next to madness to erect fortifications without putting in them sufficient men to keep them in repair. Many fortifications, commenced some years ago, for want of this provision, are now as useless as if they had never been begun. Mr. G. said, he was particularly desirous to obtain information from the Executive as to the practicability of defending the port of New York. If it could be defended, he would not be backward on the subject.

Mr. Fisk hoped the motion would prevail. Experience had proved gunboats to be useful. In their late war with Tripoli, they had been obliged to borrow a number of them, which had proved not only an instrument of defence, but likewise of offence. It was true, also, that, in other cases, they would be useful. Indeed, they appeared to be peculiarly adapted to the United States, who had a large extent of seacoast and numbers of shoals, enabling them to act with effect; that they would rot in time was true; it was also equally true that other shipping would rot; and that the loss of fifty or sixty gunboats would not be equal to that of a single frigate. It was also equally true that gunboats did not require the same expense in manning and equipping as other vessels; they were also so situated as to be capable of being instantly manned, which was not the case in regard to other vessels. The Secretary of the Navy had stated the number of men necessary for each gunboat at twenty-seven. Take three hundred and fifty men as necessary for a frigate; of course thirteen gunboats will not require more men than one frigate. Mr. F. said, he thought gunboats, in every point of view, the preferable defence. The Secretary of the Navy had stated sixty gunboats to be requisite. For the purpose, however, of accommodation, it is proposed to lessen the number of gunboats to thirty, and to apply the remaining sum to fortifications. He hoped this motion would prevail.

Mr. Early moved to postpone the further consideration of the second resolution to Monday week. In common with other members, he felt the necessity of information, before he agreed to carry further the system of gunboat defence. It appeared from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, that there were built, or on the stocks, seventy gunboats. He, for one, was of the opinion that this was a number amply sufficient, to justify the requiring at least some information on the subject, either as to the ports capable of being defended by them, or their general capability of yielding defence to the United States. All the information before the House was embraced in a single paragraph, giving the opinion of the President, that it was expedient to build sixty gunboats. The House had already determined the question of manning these gunboats; even if they should be built, they have determined not to make an appropriation for that purpose. Mr. E. said, to build, without equipping or manning, appeared to him to carry on the face of it a wanton extravagance. Are they to be suffered to lie not only unmanned, but unprotected? He presumed that no gentleman contemplated this; and yet the House had refused any appropriation for manning or equipping them.

On another account, Mr. E. considered this measure improper. Where was the occasion, or necessity, of this expense at this time? He knew they had, on some recent occasion, an alarm sounded in their ears as to the probability of being engaged in war. But, for himself, he was ready to declare that he did not, in the smallest degree, see the probability of such an event. On the contrary, so far as he was enabled to judge, from official information, he did not recollect any period of the Government when there was less cause for such apprehension. Whether, however, the measure was necessary or not, he presumed all gentlemen would agree in the propriety of obtaining information.

The motion to postpone was disagreed to—ayes 49, noes 58.

Mr. G. W. Campbell said he was in favor of filling the blank with $150,000, as from all the official information before the House this appeared to be the best mode of defence which had been devised. He observed that some time since a majority of the House had considered the gunboat system as the best means of defence. He would ask gentlemen who were then in favor of this system, and were now opposed to it, what reasons they had for their change of opinion. If the President and Heads of Departments were of opinion that such a number of gunboats was necessary, as had been named, he would ask them what reasons they had for thinking a smaller number sufficient, and whether the mere ipse dixit of a member of this House ought to stand in competition with the deliberative opinion of the heads of departments? They were peculiarly responsible to the nation, and must be considered as having taken more pains to inform themselves on such a subject than an individual member of the House.

Mr. C. said he considered some of the arguments urged on this occasion unfair. It had been asked what comparison there was between appropriating $20,000 for the protection of our ports and harbors, and $150,000 for building gunboats? The truth was, that for repairing our ports and harbors, there had been appropriated not merely $20,000, but at least half a million, a considerable part of which remained unexpended, to which the sum of $20,000 was only proposed to be added. Mr. C. said, as he understood the subject, gunboats were intended to supply the deficiency existing in other fortifications. It was the opinion of some of our best informed men that some of our ports could not be defended by batteries, and the system of gunboats was consequently brought in aid of fortifications. But it was asked whether we should build these boats without manning them. Mr. C. said he could scarcely view this as a serious argument. Was the inquiry made with regard to batteries? The answer made by gentlemen on that subject is, that in case of danger we will man them. The same answer might be given in the case of gunboats. The answer was as complete in one case as in the other. The only true inquiry was, whether in case of an attack we have a sufficient number of gunboats? It was true they might rot, and so also might frigates and fortifications. If this mode of arguing was correct, it afforded sufficient grounds for putting down all the armed vessels of the United States.

Mr. Pitkin, in reply to Mr. Fisk, observed, that he had compared the estimates of a frigate and gunboats, from which he inferred that the equipment and annual expense of a frigate of 44 guns, compared to that of gunboats, was as eighteen to one.

Mr. Elliot said, that if the opinion of the President should be complied with, there would be one hundred and twenty-nine gunboats built, which in actual service would transcend the expense of the Navy of the United States, and would cost more than a million of dollars. Mr. E. said he considered the reproach cast upon those who were formerly the advocates of gunboats as strong evidence of their inutility. Gunboats had been lately thought much of; what was the result? That gunboats might be considered as a kind of vessel guarding a little deposit of national spirit, if any there was left to put on board; but as soon as they were assailed by the wind or waves, their maiden purity was gone. They were of no use whenever there was wind or tide, and could only float in a time of profound tranquillity.

Mr. Alston said he possessed little information with regard to the advantages or disadvantages that were likely to flow from building the number of gunboats that was proposed. He merely rose to ask the attention of gentlemen to the grounds taken at the last session. The building of gunboats had been instituted on the recommendation of the President made at the last session. Gentlemen would there find the reasons on which that system had been begun. They were not intended to be set afloat on the ocean, to commit depredation or attack vessels at sea, but as an aid and support to our fortifications, and to prevent an enemy from annoying our seaports. It was, he believed, the opinion of the House at the last session, that gunboats constituted the best system that could be devised for this purpose. Mr. A. said he had since seen no reason to change his opinion on this subject. He trusted in God the time would not arrive when these gunboats would be called into operation. But could this in fairness be considered as an argument against them? This system of defence having been adopted, before it was abandoned gentlemen ought to show their inutility. The language of the President on this subject was stronger than any he could use. He would, therefore, take the liberty of laying it before the House.

"I cannot, therefore, but recommend such preparations as circumstances call for. The first object is to place our seaport towns out of the danger of insult. Measures have been already taken for furnishing them with heavy cannon for the service of such land batteries as may make a part of their defence against armed vessels approaching them. In aid of these it is desirable we should have a competent number of gunboats, and the number to be competent must be considerable."

Mr. Smilie said he had voted for the postponement, to give gentlemen an opportunity of getting information. He had not heard a single gentleman on either side profess to have any information with regard to the power of gunboats. Was it not then singular, that when this measure was recommended by the proper officer, and every member acknowledged his ignorance, that it should be objected to? It was not their duty to be minutely acquainted with the subject; he would respect the opinions of those who were best acquainted with it. He said he had been informed that our naval officers were of opinion that gunboats were the best system of defence, and it was evident that so far as they had been under the necessity of using them, they had not been disappointed in their expectations.

Mr. Early moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until this day week.

Mr. Lloyd said he should have no objection to the postponement, if he knew any mode of obtaining the information desired. It appeared that the Committee had applied to the Secretary of the Navy, who ought to possess full information on the subject. What was his reply? Waiving altogether the expression of his own opinion, he merely confined himself to stating that the President thinks it expedient to build sixty additional gunboats. Whence, then, were they to get the information that was desired, to enable them to determine whether gunboats are a proper defence for the United States? They might apply to the President or the Secretary of the Navy, and get information from them that they think them necessary. Mr. L., however, said that he was of opinion that they ought to judge on this subject from what had already taken place. For himself he was free to declare that he was opposed to the gunboat system. He had carefully attended to the arguments of gentlemen, and to what did they amount? Have they adduced an argument to show their utility, or produced an instance to show where they have been useful? It has been said that their utility is established by the use made of them against Tripoli. But he would ask whether they would have been of any use if the vessels of Tripoli had left the shore? It was admitted that gunboats were not useful on the ocean. It was evident, then, that they were building a navy for a state of perfect calm; and were gentlemen disposed to expend millions for vessels that would be only useful under such circumstances?

It is said, however, that they will aid our fortifications. To this, however, it might be replied, that it would be high time to build them after the erection of the fortifications. Several years have elapsed since the first gunboats have been built, and what have they done? Have they, in a single instance, proved themselves to be of the least utility? Let us, then, until they are proved to be useful, refrain from building any more.

Mr. L. concluded by observing that when he heard arguments weak as these to induce them to adopt this measure, they were sufficiently strong to convince him that it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. Early observed that the only information received from the Executive on this subject was as to the number of gunboats in their opinion requisite. This was not the point on which at present they wished for information. He added, that if they got no further information, he should withhold his vote from giving a single cent for this purpose.

Mr. Mumford.—The gentleman from North Carolina on my right, said that if any gentleman can show us any better mode of defence we shall be glad to hear it, and although I think it incumbent on him to show us the utility of gunboats, I will not detain the House but a few minutes to recommend what I conceive to be a far better mode of defence, I mean solid and durable fortifications that will last for ages, and block-ships similar to the draught now held in my hand, and which any gentleman may examine at his leisure if he chooses. Sir, the experience off Copenhagen is an evidence of their real utility. Witness the engagement with the British fleet and the Crown battery, (somewhat similar to the plan of Montalembert, recommended by me in debate yesterday,) and the block-ships. That fleet was actually silenced, and nothing saved the proud navy of old England on that memorable day but the game of flag of truce played off so successfully by the hero of Trafalgar; and when in order I shall move to adopt those block-ships in place of gunboats.

Mr. Elmer said he should vote against the postponement, as he knew of no information that could be obtained which would be of any service. Gentlemen in favor of this measure seem to confide solely in Executive information. If they were thus disposed to appropriate money whenever the Executive required it—be it so. He, however, believed that it was the duty of the House to get all the information they could obtain, and to act on their own judgment, and he should withhold his assent from completing the system begun the last year. Mr. Elmer here suggested, as the best mode of defending the port of New York, to fill up the channel within fifteen or twenty feet of high water mark.

Mr. Chandler said he was in favor of the system of defence by gunboats; but, since the gentleman from New York had proposed a new system of defence, he thought it would be best for the present to postpone the subject; and in the mean time to call on the Secretary of War to state what system had been adopted and pursued for defending the port of New York.

Mr. Tallmadge said the question before the House had no connexion with the defence of New York; it was a proposition for building gunboats. Having been on the select committee that brought in these resolutions, he thought it proper to state that there had not in that committee been a unanimous opinion in favor of gunboats. He was himself entirely hostile to the measure. He saw no necessity for adding to the number already built, or authorized to be erected. They had thirteen gunboats fit for service, and fifty-six would be soon launched. It would seem to him better to comport with the system of economy, in the first instance, to finish and prepare these fifty-six for service. No reason had been assigned for the additional sixty that had been proposed, but the mere opinion of the President. Mr. T. said he did not wish to call in question the high authority attached to the opinion of the President, but he would wish to know whether any naval officer had recommended gunboats as a proper defence for the country. He did believe there were some particular circumstances under which they would be useful, and under this impression he had hitherto voted. But when he saw nothing but gunboats called for, he was placed under the necessity of refusing to grant a single dollar. It appeared as if they were contemplated to be relied on as the exclusive defence of the United States, and as if it were intended to let the frigates rot. He was opposed to the postponement, as he did not see the probability of obtaining any useful information not already before the House.

Mr. Fisk said he was sorry to detain the House a moment longer. The gentleman from Connecticut had observed that he had fallen into a great mistake when he said the expense of eighteen gunboats was not more than that of one frigate. He had read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to show the comparative expense of gunboat No 1, and the frigate Boston; but in this statement he had altogether forgotten to mention the expense of the marines. There was another circumstance which the gentleman had failed to notice—viz: that gunboat No 1, had cost between 10 and $11,000, and required about forty men to man her, while the boats at present proposed to be built would only require $5,000, and between a half and two-thirds of that number of men. On attending to these circumstances he would find that his estimate was very moderate, and that he might have said that a frigate would cost as much as twenty instead of eighteen gunboats. Another reason, however, had been urged by the gentleman against gunboats, which was their being contemplated as a substitute for the navy. Mr. F. said this was one of the strongest reasons that operated on his mind in their favor. It was unnecessary to man them until they were called into actual service. Not so with regard to the frigates, the seamen on board of which it was necessary should be very skilful, and which were consequently necessary to be constantly manned. Mr. F. said he did not feel very anxious on this subject, as he did not perceive any present necessity for increasing our armaments. But as measures of defence were pressed, he was decidedly in favor of adopting that mode which appeared to him the cheapest and the best. As to the objection which had been made with regard to the number of gunboats proposed, when they considered the numberless rivers in the United States, they would find there was scarcely one gunboat for each navigable stream. Mr. F. said he likewise preferred gunboats to frigates, inasmuch as they were not calculated to go abroad. He considered them as a valuable auxiliary to land batteries.

Mr. Dwight.—If either the plan of defending the city of New York, proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, who has just sat down, (Mr. Fisk,) or that mentioned a few minutes since by a gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. Elmer,) should be adopted, it is certainly unnecessary to postpone the consideration of the resolution now before the House. The gentleman from Vermont proposes to man the gunboats with militia, and says he is in favor of this system of defence, because it is both safe and cheap. Does the gentleman mean to man the gunboats with men from their farms, armed with spades and pitchforks? If he does, it will certainly be a safe kind of warfare; for such seamen will, the moment a ship of war appears in sight, make the best of their way ashore, and leave the gunboats to take care of themselves; and it will be cheap, for there will be no expense of blood or treasure. Why, you might just as well put militia to the performance of such feats upon the slack or tight rope, as were exhibited a few weeks since in this city, in the presence, and to the great entertainment of many members of this House.

But if we adopt the plan suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey, there will be as little reason for the postponement. His plan is, to fill up the entrance to the harbor of New York, by sinking vessels in the channel. The fifty-six gun-boats which are already built, and which are on the stocks, will probably be sufficient for that purpose. At least, it will not be worth while to build any more until the experiment has been made. Should there prove to be a deficiency, should there not be enough entirely to fill up the channel, and prevent all access to the harbor; if the country can breed them as fast as the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Holland) seems to suppose, that is, two or three thousand in as many months, the deficiency will be readily and seasonably supplied. On neither ground then can the postponement be either useful or necessary.

Mr. Pitkin insisted upon it, that, according to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, eighteen gunboats in actual service would cost as much as one frigate.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone, which was disagreed to—yeas 49, nays 56.

Mr. Eppes moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution until Monday. He said it would take but a short time to gain the information desired by gentlemen. If they could not get detailed information on the subject, the gunboats ought to be resigned to their fate. Mr. E. said he well recollected that some time ago a gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Nicholson) read to the House a number of papers in support of their utility, in consequence of which, and other information, the House had voted for them. Mr. E. said he was ready to vote for gunboats as the best defence that could be devised. He had never contemplated them, however, as answering the purpose of a navy. They had, on the contrary, been considered as a proper substitute for expensive fortifications. What would be the advantage of fortifications in the country generally, and particularly New York? Were they sure that expending even a million of dollars would make that place secure? What had they been told a few days since? That a single vessel would be able to lay the place under contribution. If this opinion was correct, it showed that some other defence must be resorted to for the defence of our ports and harbors. It was not, however, Mr. E. said, his intention to go into the dissussion. He was so hoarse that he could scarcely utter the few words that had fallen from him.

Mr. Smilie observed that they had got into a curious situation. There appeared to be three parties in the House. All those in favor of a fleet were opposed to gunboats. Some gentlemen were in favor of fortifications exclusively, while others were willing to go to a certain expense in fortifications combined with gunboats. This was his own wish. For his own part, he was ready to say, that if there could be devised no defence of the country except by a fleet, it should not be defended by his vote, and fortifications require so vast an expense, he should be against fortifying. But he believed, by combining gunboats and fortifications, the country could be defended at a moderate expense. Mr. S. said that he believed information in support of the utility of gunboats could be procured. If, however, gentlemen refused asking for this information, and were determined to break down the system of gunboats, let them take the responsibility upon themselves. He believed they would get neither gunboats nor fortifications.

Mr. Van Cortlandt said he observed that some gentlemen had said that the fortifications at present at New York were of no use. This, however, he believed was not the fact. Fort Jay could prevent a vessel from lying before it, and so far the fortifications were of great service. It was true, with a strong wind a vessel might pass. But what then? She could afterwards do but little injury. He granted that gunboats might be of some service to a certain extent, but they ought not to be relied on altogether. Batteries were useful to annoy an enemy, and in addition to them, some coasting vessels would be very serviceable for the purpose of keeping off disorderly and unauthorized persons, such as they had recently seen. He said he should vote for filling the blank with $150,000, for the purpose of building gunboats, though he did not believe they would prove to be of such use as some gentlemen seemed disposed to imagine. But as gentlemen had declared they would not vote for fortifications without gunboats, he was willing to vote for both.

Mr. Cook said they had only nine hundred and fifty seamen at present on the peace establishment. They had thirteen gunboats already built, and fifty-six others building. When completed these would require one thousand and seventy men to man them. But of what use would gunboats be unmanned? He was willing to agree to a short postponement for the purpose of obtaining further information.

Mr. Thomas said he rose to correct a remark of the gentleman from Virginia, that a million of dollars had been expended on the port of New York. The fact was that the General Government had only expended about $100,000.

Mr. Eppes said he had observed that from information which he had received, he believed the sums expended on the port of New York, including what had been laid out by the State, amounted to near a million.

Mr. Thomas said he was willing to acquiesce in the postponement till Monday, as so short a delay was not calculated to embarrass the measure. In reply to the gentleman who had said that the fortifications would be of no use unless they were manned, he would observe there was an organized and effective militia in New York, that might be called into service at an hour's notice, and would be competent to repel any force that was likely to be brought against them.

Mr. Varnum said he did not know precisely the amount of money which had been expended on the port of New York, but he believed that more than $120,000 had been expended before the appropriation of the last year. There had been a regular appropriation ever since the year 1794 for the defence of the ports and harbors.

[Mr. Varnum here detailed the several appropriations made for this purpose.]

In addition to these, large appropriations had been made for fortifications. The total of these appropriations amounted to $955,000. How much had been applied to the port of New York, he could not say. He thought the ports and harbors of the United States ought to be defended. The idea of retreating to the mountains was abhorrent to his mind. On the contrary, he thought the enemy ought to be met at the water's edge, and fought inch by inch. The true question, however, was, in what way an enemy might be best repelled? As to New York he believed it was impossible to erect batteries which would prevent vessels from passing by them; but surely they might be so constructed as greatly to annoy them.

Mr. V. said he confessed he was no great admirer of gunboats, though he was willing to allow they might under some circumstances be of considerable use. For the purpose of defending New York, measures had already been pursued to a considerable extent. In addition to the gunboats which had been built, a large number of cannon had been mounted on travelling carriages. Besides this, there were two regiments of artillery completely organized. Taking the system adopted in all its parts, he did think it was the only safe system that could be adopted for the defence of that harbor, as well as the other harbors of the United States. He had, however, no objection to a short postponement for the purpose of getting information.

Mr. Thomas said they had the last session received information from the President of the United States, that the whole sum expended on the harbor of New York, only amounted to one and twenty-three thousand dollars.

Mr. Smilie said he rose for the purpose of explanation. If gentlemen imagined he had said he would abandon New York or any other port of the Union, they had not correctly heard what he had said. He had observed that he would never consent to defend the country by a fleet. He believed there was no country on earth whose commerce would justify the creation of a navy merely for its protection. He would rather, therefore, give up the whole trade than protect it by a navy.

The question was then taken on postponing the consideration of the resolution until Monday, which was carried—yeas 69.

It was ordered that a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the first of the said resolutions, as agreed to by the House, on the twenty-third ultimo; and that Mr. Thomas, Mr. Tallmadge, Mr. Rea of Pennsylvania, Mr. Wynns, Mr. Elliot, Mr. Stanton, and Mr. Varnum, do prepare and bring in the same.

On motion of Mr. Early, the House adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House such information as may be in the possession of the Executive department tending to show the efficacy of gunboats in the protection and defence of ports and harbors, and particularly a list of such of the principal ports and harbors as may be defended or essentially assisted in being defended by gun boats, together with the number necessary for each.

Ordered, That Mr. Early and Mr. Eppes be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

Friday, February 6.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the laws for the government of Louisiana, passed by the Governor and Judges of the Indiana Territory, at their session at Vincennes, begun on the first of October, one thousand eight hundred and four. The Message was read, and, together with the laws transmitted therewith, referred to the committee appointed, on the eighth ultimo, on a Message from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the laws of the Territory of Michigan.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill which originated in this House, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of William Hearn from his imprisonment," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, stating that the Government of France having examined the claim of the heirs of M. de Beaumarchais against the United States, had found it just and reasonable, and instructed the Minister here to apply for payment. A note from General Turreau to the Secretary of State was transmitted with the Message.

Mr. Gregg moved a reference of the Message with the accompanying documents to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. Bassett preferred a reference to a select committee.

Mr. Ely did not like the terms of the address for this claim. It was expressed in terms too imperious. No nation on earth had a right to use the language of authority towards our Government. Mr. E. moved that it lie on the table, and after it was printed the House could better decide as to the disposition of the claim.

Mr. D. R. Williams thought the note of the French Minister sufficiently decorous.

Mr. Pitkin preferred a reference of the subject to the Committee of Claims. They had once examined it, and are therefore most competent to investigate its merits again.

Mr. Alston said it was usual to refer Messages from the President either to a select committee or to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Dana inquired whether the claim of the Danish Minister for the brig Henrick was at a former session referred to the Committee of Claims. He believed it was.

The Speaker answered that such was his impression.

Mr. J. Clay observed that the course mentioned was then pursued.

The Message and documents were referred to the Committee of Claims.

ISSUING OF DEBENTURES.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on Tuesday last, to the bill authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases: Whereupon, the said amendment being again read, was, upon the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. Eppes, further to amend the second section of the said bill, by striking out, from the word "restriction," in the third line thereof, the following words: "to direct debentures to be issued in similar cases which may have happened prior to the passing of this act, and subsequent to the second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and three, or where such application shall be made within six months from the passing thereof, inserting, "receive applications for debentures in similar cases which may have happened within —— years prior to the passing of this act, and to report the same to the next session of Congress:" and on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. Early further to amend the said bill by adding, to the end thereof, a new section, in the words following to wit:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, whenever any person or persons shall apply to the Comptroller of the Treasury for relief under the first or second sections of this act, his or their petition shall be first preferred to the judge of the district from which the goods, wares, and merchandise, were exported, and such persons shall do and perform all such things as are required by the first section of the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities, accruing in certain cases therein mentioned;" and the said judge shall proceed in like manner as is directed in the said act, to inquire into, state, and transmit, the facts touching the case, to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who, thereupon, may grant such relief, under the conditions, limitations, and restrictions of this act:

And on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

On the question, whether the bill should pass to a third reading? Messrs. Clay and Dana spoke in favor of, and Messrs. R. Williams and Eppes against the bill.

Mr. Sloan also spoke against the bill, and was replied to by

Mr. Lyon, who delivered a speech of considerable length in favor of the bill, interspersed with many sarcastic remarks on the oratory of Mr. Sloan. Mr. L. noticed repeatedly the phraseology of Mr. S., particularly that of retrospecting backwards. The House was so much diverted by Mr. L.'s speech, that the Speaker was frequently obliged to call to order.

Mr. Sloan hoped the long and elegant speech, or rather sermon he should say, of Mr. Lyon would soon be published, as it seemed to be written out and ready for the press, that they might once more be gratified by its elegance.

Mr. D. R. Williams had spoken sometime in reply to Mr. J. Clay, when the glass of one of the windows of the Representative Chamber was broken and blown into the room by the violence of the wind, and the members in that quarter were compelled to leave their seats. An attempt was made to secure the window by closing the shutters, and they were blown into the room. Whereupon, in this crisis, on motion of Mr. D. R. Williams, the House, at 2 o'clock, adjourned.

Saturday, February 7.

On motion of Mr. Lattimore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing and maintaining an institution at Natchez, for the relief of sick and disabled boatmen, out of such funds as may be constituted by a tax upon persons employed in the navigation of the Mississippi; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. Thomas, from the committee appointed on the fifth instant, presented a bill for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. Lyon,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of retaining a greater proportion of the duties on articles the growth or manufacture of foreign countries which may be re-exported.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Governor and Judges of the Territory of Michigan, transmitting their report, made in obedience to the act, entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of titles of land in the town of Detroit, and Territory of Michigan, and for other purposes;" which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to reduce the expenses attending the administration of justice in the District of Columbia," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act confirming claims to land in the District of Vincennes," was read twice and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the discharge of William Hearn from his imprisonment:" Whereupon, the first amendment of the Senate to the enacting clause of the said bill, being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Resolved, That this House doth agree with the Senate in the title of the said bill, amended to read as follows: "An act for the relief of William Hearn."

Mr. Broom submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to make further provision for securing the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus to persons in custody under or by color of the authority of the United States.

Mr. B. wished the resolution might lie a few days on the table before he called up the subject to the consideration of the House. He then moved that it lie on the table. Agreed to.

ISSUING OF DEBENTURES.

The House proceeded to the farther consideration of the bill authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases.

Mr. D. R. Williams moved that the bill be recommitted. Not carried—ayes 36, noes 49.

The question was about to be taken, whether the bill should be engrossed for a third reading, when Mr. Holland rose and spoke at length against the bill.

The question was then taken on engrossing the bill by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 52, the Speaker declaring himself with the nays. The vote was as follows:

Yeas—Joseph Barker, Joseph Clay, George Clinton jr., Orchard Cook, Richard Cutts, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, junior, Peter Early, James Elliot, Ebenezer Elmer, William Findley, James M. Garnett, Seth Hastings, David Hough, John G. Jackson, Walter Jones, Thomas Kenan, Joseph Lewis, jun., Henry W. Livingston, Edward Lloyd, Matthew Lyon, Robert Marion, Josiah Masters, William McCreery, Nicholas R. Moore, Jonathan O. Mosely, Gurdon S. Mumford, Jeremiah Nelson, Thomas Newton, jr., Timothy Pitkin, jr., John Porter, Josiah Quincy, Thomas M. Randolph, John Russell, Peter Sailly, Martin G. Schuneman, Dennis Smelt, Samuel Smith, Joseph Stanton, Samuel Taggart, Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, David Thomas, Thomas W. Thompson, Uri Tracy, Abram Trigg, Daniel C. Verplanck, Peleg Wadsworth, Matthew Walton, Eliphalet Wickes, Nathan Williams, and Thomas Wynns.

Nays—Willis Alston, jr., Isaac Anderson, John Archer, David Bard, Burwell Bassett, George M. Bedinger, William W. Bibb, John Blake, jr., Thomas Blount, Robert Brown, John Boyle, William A. Burwell, George W. Campbell, John Chandler, Martin Chittenden, John Claiborne, Matthew Clay, Frederick Conrad, Ezra Darby, Elias Earle, Caleb Ellis, William Ely, John W. Eppes, James Fisk, Charles Goldsborough, Peterson Goodwyn, Andrew Gregg, Silas Halsey, John Hamilton, James Holland, David Holmes, James Kelly, John Lambert, Duncan McFarland, David Meriwether, John Morrow, Gideon Olin, John Pugh, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Thomas Sandford, Ebenezer Seaver, James Sloan, John Smilie, John Smith, Richard Stanford, Joseph B. Varnum, John Whitehill, Robert Whitehill, David R. Williams, Alexander Wilson, and Joseph Winston.

And so the bill was rejected.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Mr. Varnum observed that he had heard with pleasure the ardent and patriotic zeal of the Representatives from the State of New York, to procure an appropriation for further fortifying the city of New York. Mr. V. doubted whether the grant already agreed to would be adequate to the purpose. He therefore moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to appropriate one hundred thousand dollars in addition to the sums heretofore granted, to enable the President of the United States to cause the port and harbor of New York to be better fortified and defended.

Mr. Varnum moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred the bill reported this morning, appropriating twenty thousand dollars for fortifications.

Mr. D. R. Williams inquired if it were in order to move an amendment to the resolution.

The Speaker answered in the negative.

Mr. D. R. Williams hoped then that the resolution would be rejected. He had intended to move the insertion of Charleston, South Carolina, if it had been in order. That city is ten thousand times more exposed than New York. There is but one single gun that can be fired, and that only a four-pounder.

Mr. Varnum.—Let the gentleman bring forward a distinct resolution. If Charleston need additional measures of defence, I will cheerfully accord to an appropriation.

Mr. Smilie concurred in the opinion that the gentleman (Mr. D. R. Williams) had better bring forward a distinct resolution.

Mr. D. R. Williams was an enemy to all partial appropriations. He was totally hostile to the idea of being so lavish in favor of New York, and leaving other places defenceless. He could see no objection to the insertion of Charleston, unless gentlemen were disposed to protect only a particular section of the Union.

Mr. Chandler was against the resolution. He did not like this partial method of legislation. Let the gentleman move an amendment to the bill when it shall be taken up in Committee of the Whole. That will answer the purpose.

Mr. Varnum said he had intended to move such an amendment to the bill, and he had introduced this resolution in order to give notice of that intention. If Charleston cannot be sufficiently fortified with the $20,000, now applicable to that object, he was willing to agree to more.

Mr. Dana could see no use in this resolution. He was surprised that any gentleman sincerely disposed to promote measures for the defence of New York should pursue such a partial course. The ports to be fortified have been designated by law. Make a general appropriation, and let the Executive direct the expenditure where it is most wanted. This scrambling for particular ports tends to defeat the object and to destroy the whole system of fortification.

Mr. Marion said that the account of Charleston given by his colleague was correct. The only reason why he had failed to call up the subject to the consideration of the House was, that the ground selected for fortifications had been but recently ceded to the United States, by the Legislature of South Carolina, and he supposed measures for the defence of the place would now be soon taken.

Mr. Newton hoped the resolution would be withdrawn, and an amendment moved to the bill. He felt unconquerable repugnance to such partial legislation. The place from which he came (Norfolk) was equally exposed, and needed additional fortification as well as New York.

Mr. Thomas was glad to see members from different parts of the Union now in favor of fortifications. The other day there seemed to be few or none, except from the State of New York, who were disposed to do anything on the subject. Mr. T. thought every member must agree that New York stood in more need of being strongly fortified than any other place whatever.

Mr. Quincy concurred in the opinion that New York required measures of defence more than any other port, but he was against the resolution because it was not calculated to gain the end in view. He thought the experience of last session would show the evils of such partial demands for fortification. A resolution was brought forward to fortify New York. One member moved to add Charleston, another Norfolk, another Portsmouth, and another Georgetown, on the Potomac. This House is not competent to determine the portions of money which ought to be respectively allotted to the defence of the several ports in the Union.

Mr. Elmer was against the resolution on every principle. He thought $20,000, which had been voted, large enough. New York is like to be in no danger the ensuing year.

Mr. Mumford.—We have fought hard and tried repeatedly for a general appropriation, but without success. The $20,000 is nothing. It ought not to be named. I had rather have left a blank. I hope, therefore, that we may get a partial appropriation. I am willing to vote any sum for Charleston or Norfolk which may be necessary.

Mr. Bidwell.—The object of the resolution is only to give notice. I see no impropriety in it. Let it go to a committee, and then the House can decide upon it. They are not pledged to adopt it by consenting to this direction.

Mr. Conrad was against the resolution. He could see no use in it. He was willing to give $200,000 or $300,000 for New York if the sum could be advantageously expended the ensuing year, but had supposed that it could not.

Mr. Dana.—The proposition is now defended on the ground that it is only equivalent to giving notice of an intended amendment to a bill. Little need be said in reply to that argument. If a member of this House can be believed when he makes a declaration on this floor, it is sufficient for him merely to announce his intention. If you refer this resolution as moved, you admit the principle of a partial appropriation—a principle to which I am decidedly adverse.

I am in favor of a general system of fortification; this partial appropriation goes in truth to sacrifice the very measure it purports to aid. I am therefore against it. It is calculated to defeat every idea of fortification.

Mr. Varnum had no wish to disoblige any member of the House. He was not anxious that the question on a reference of the resolution to a Committee of the Whole should be put. His object of giving notice would be attained without it. He therefore withdrew the motion, and then moved that the resolution lie on the table.—Agreed to.

Monday, February 9.

Mr. Early, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill authorizing vessels, from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, to enter at Plymouth, and establishing a port of delivery at Augusta, in the District of Maine; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

Mr. Stanton, from the committee to whom was referred, on the fourth instant, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Daniel S. Dexter, presented a bill for the relief of Daniel S. Dexter; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. Lattimore presented to the House a petition of the Grand Jurors of Washington District, in the Mississippi Territory, which was received and read, praying that the time allowed, by law, for the payment of lands purchased of the United States, in the said Territory, may be extended; that further time may be allowed for establishing donation right to lands in the said Territory; and that Congress will grant some real and effective encouragement to schools in the said district.

Mr. Mumford presented to the House a petition of Joshua Sands, late Collector of the Customs for the port of New York, which was received and read, stating that he issued, while collector aforesaid, sundry debentures of merchandise exported to New Orleans, then a part of the Spanish possessions in America; that, upon exhibiting his accounts at the Treasury, the accounting officers objected to his charge of debentures so paid; and praying that the said debentures, paid by him as aforesaid, may be allowed, and a final settlement of his accounts effected.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. Parke,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations ought to be made in the laws fixing the salaries of the Secretaries and Judges of the Indiana, Louisiana, and Michigan Territories; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. Parke, Mr. Jeremiah Morrow, Mr. Sandford, Mr. Jeremiah Nelson, and Mr. Fisk.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill sent from this House, entitled "An act to extend the power of granting writs of injunctions to the Judges of the District Courts of the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Chester; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act concerning the District of Columbia.

This bill repeals the existing provision interdicting the arrest of the person for debts below twenty dollars.

Mr. Goldsborough moved a new section repealing the eighth section of an existing act, which prohibits the allowance of compensation to justices of the peace and jurors; which was agreed to.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill.

Mr. Jackson moved to commit the bill to the same committee to whom is referred a bill from the Senate for reducing the expenses attending the administration of justice in the district of Columbia.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. Goldsborough, and J. Clay, and disagreed to. When the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States.

The provision, punishing the importation of slaves with imprisonment, was stricken out, and the punishment of death substituted.

The Committee having passed on to the seventh section, it was read as follows:

"That all such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, as may be forfeited by virtue of this act, [shall, at the expense of the United States, be conveyed to such place or places in the United States, as the President thereof may direct, and there be indentured as apprentices or servants, or otherwise employed, as the President may judge most beneficial for them, and most safe for the United States: Provided, That no such negro, mulatto, or person of color, shall be indentured or employed as aforesaid, except in some State or Territory, in which slavery is not permitted, or in which provision is now made for a gradual abolition of slavery; nor in any State, in which such persons are not permitted by law to be indentured or employed as aforesaid; and if any such negro, mulatto, or person of color, when so indentured or employed, shall be under the age of —— years, the term of such indenture or employment shall not extend beyond the age of twenty-one years; and if above the age of —— years, the term shall not exceed —— years."]

Mr. Early moved to strike out all the words of the section in brackets, and to insert in lieu thereof the following words:

"shall be, by the marshal of the district or territory having custody of the same, be delivered over to such officer of the State or Territorial government as may by any law of the State or Territory be directed to receive them, to be disposed of as by any such law may be provided."

Mr. Early said the inhabitants of the Southern States would resist this provision with their lives. We want no civil wars, no rebellions, no insurrections, no resistance to the authority of the Government. Give effect then to this wish, and do not pass this bill as it now stands.

Mr. Smilie.—This opens such a scene as I never expected to witness in this House. If it were not owing to the impulse of the moment, and the influence of passion, I should think it extremely reprehensible. Are we to be threatened with civil war? that our laws will be resisted at the peril of life? Sir, this is new doctrine. The gentleman must know that we are not to be terrified by a threat of civil war.

Mr. Early said the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Smilie) had made a palpable misrepresentation of his sentiments. I do not threaten the Government with civil war. I only communicated the idea that military force would be necessary to carry the law into execution. I wish to know what has become of common sense? I disclaim the threat of civil war.

Mr. Sloan.—The observations of the Southern members, I think, bear rather too hard on us from the Middle States. [Here the Chairman interrupted Mr. Sloan, and said he conceived it out of order to allude to different sections of the Union.] Mr. S. proceeded. I was speaking to the section under consideration, and I thought it was not out of order to speak to sentiments which had been dropped by other gentlemen before me on the section.

The Southern gentlemen have said if we would take away the negroes from them, they would be satisfied. We have exerted every stretch of our genius to do this, we have agreed to take them ourselves.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Early) has mentioned that they now are willing, as an act of great condescension to give up the question, whether the United States shall sell the negroes as slaves; and for what? To sell them themselves. This is mighty condescension indeed.

Mr. Cook was in favor of the motion.

Mr. Marion was also in favor of the motion. If the provision was continued, the law would be wholly inoperative. Were he on a jury and the evidence ever so strong, he should deem it his duty not to find a verdict against a man charged with a breach of this law.

Messrs. Cook, J. Clay, Holland, and Alston, spoke in favor of the motion, and Messrs. Bedinger, Bidwell and Goldsborough against it.

Mr. D. R. Williams moved that the Committee rise.

Mr. Cook was in favor of the motion.

Mr Early said he believed that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cook) was sincere in his endeavors to procure a law which would not be injurious to their happiness (of the Southern States.) He wished he could say the same of some other members.

Mr. Macon supported the motion.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

Tuesday, February 10.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, in compliance with the request of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of the fifth instant, giving information of the effect of gunboats in the protection and defence of harbors, of the numbers thought necessary, and of the proposed distribution of them among the ports and harbors of the United States. The Message was read, and, together with the documents transmitted therewith, ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. Early, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be published the report and chart of a survey of the coast of North Carolina, made by Thomas Coles and Jonathan Price, under the act of Congress passed at the last session for that purpose; and that the said Secretary be authorized to give them the privilege of securing to themselves the copy-right thereof, provided they will undertake the expense of the publication, and secure the performance of such other conditions as he may think proper to promote the objects of the Government in directing the said survey to be made. But such copyright shall not operate to prevent Congress from having said chart incorporated into any general chart of the coast of the United States, which they may think proper to cause to be executed.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the power of granting writs of injunction to the Judges of the District Courts of the United States: Whereupon the amendments, together with the bill, were committed to Mr. Jackson, Mr. Holland, and Mr. Fisk.

Another Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a letter from Cowles Mead, Secretary of the Mississippi Territory, to the Secretary of War, in relation to the movements of Aaron Burr.

The Message was read, and, together with the letter transmitted therewith, ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to prevent frauds committed on the Bank of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States. Considerable progress was made in the discussion of the provisions of the bill, when the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. J. Randolph,

Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States, of the 15th of April, 1806, transmitting a treaty between the United States of America and the Piankeshaw tribe of Indians, together with the said treaty, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land in the Territory of Michigan."

Mr. Jackson, from the committee to whom was committed, yesterday, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the power of granting writs of injunctions to the Judges of the District Courts of the United States, reported their agreement to the first, and their disagreement to the second of the said amendments. The House proceeded to consider the said amendments of the Senate, and the report of the select committee thereon: Whereupon

Resolved, That this House do concur with the Senate in their said amendments.

On motion of Mr. Chandler,

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and eight," to which Committee of the whole House was committed on the twentieth ultimo, the amendatory bill, which originated in this House, to prohibit the importation or bringing of slaves into the United States, or the Territories thereof, after the thirty-first day of December next; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto. The House proceeded to consider the said amendments: Whereupon, an adjournment being called for, the House adjourned.

Thursday, February 12.

The said Message was read, and, together with the returns transmitted therewith, ordered to lie on the table.

The said Message was read, and, together with the laws transmitted therewith, ordered to be referred to the committee appointed, on the eighth ultimo, on a Message from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the laws of the Territory of Michigan.

INDIANA TERRITORY.

Mr. Parke, from the committee to whom was referred the letter of William Henry Harrison, Governor of the Indiana Territory, enclosing certain resolutions of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the said Territory, made the following report:

That the resolutions of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory relate to a suspension, for the term of ten years, of the sixth article of compact between the United States and the Territories Northwest of the river Ohio, passed the 13th July, 1787. That article declares "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said Territory."

The suspension of the said article would operate an immediate and essential benefit to the Territory, as emigration to it will be inconsiderable for many years, except from those States where slavery is tolerated; and although it is not considered expedient to force the population of the Territory, yet it is desirable to connect its scattered settlements, and, in regard to political rights, to place it on an equal footing with the different States. From the interior situation of the Territory, it is not believed that slaves would ever become so numerous as to endanger the internal peace or future prosperity of the country. The current of emigration flowing to the Western country, the Territories ought all to be opened to their introduction. The abstract question of liberty and slavery is not involved in the proposed measure, as slavery now exists to a considerable extent in different parts of the Union; it would not augment the number of slaves, but merely authorize the removal to Indiana of such as are held in bondage in the United States. If slavery is an evil, means ought to be devised to render it least dangerous to the community, and by which the hopeless situation of the slaves would be most ameliorated; and to accomplish these objects, no measure would be so effectual as the one proposed. The committee, therefore, respectfully submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to suspend, from and after the 1st day of January, 1808, the sixth article of compact between the United States and the Territories and States Northwest of the river Ohio, passed the 13th day of July, 1787, for the term of ten years.

Referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the whole House, yesterday, to the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and eight:" Whereupon, the first, second, and third amendments to the said bill, being again read, were, upon the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The fourth amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House to the said bill, being again read in the words following, to wit:

Sec. 3, lines thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen, after the word "guilty," strike out the words "of felony; and being thereof convicted before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall suffer death;" and insert, "of a high misdemeanor; and being thereof convicted before any court having competent jurisdiction, shall suffer imprisonment for not more than ten years, nor less than five years."

A motion was then made by Mr. George W. Campbell, to amend the said amendment, by adding, to the end thereof, the words, "and fined not exceeding ten thousand dollars, nor less than one thousand dollars;" and, on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The question was then stated that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole in their said amendment, as amended, on which a division of the said question was called for; and the question, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in so much of their said amendment as proposed to strike out the words before recited, to wit: "of felony; and being thereof convicted before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall suffer death;"

Messrs. Smilie and Sloan opposed, and Messrs. Elmer and Kelly supported, the striking out.

The yeas and nays were taken, and were—yeas 67, nays 48, as follows:

And then the question was taken that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole, in so much of their said amendment, as amended, as proposes to insert, in lieu of the words stricken out, the words, "of a high misdemeanor; and being thereof convicted before any court having competent jurisdiction, shall suffer imprisonment for not more than ten years, or less than five years, and fined not exceeding ten thousand dollars, nor less than one thousand dollars."

On inserting the foregoing provision, Mr. J. Randolph spoke in opposition, on the ground that such an excessive penalty could not, in such case, be constitutionally imposed by a Government possessed of the limited powers of the Government of the United States.

The question was then put, and carried without a division.

The fifth amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, to amend the eighth section of the bill, by inserting, after the word "color," in the fifth line thereof, the words, "who may hereafter be imported contrary to the provisions of this act," being again read, was, upon the question being put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

Another motion was then made by Mr. Early, further to amend the said bill by adding to the end of the eighth section, the following proviso:

"Provided, however, that nothing in this section shall extend to prohibit the taking on board or transporting any negro, mulatto, or person of color, (not imported contrary to the provisions of this act,) in any vessel or species of craft whatever, from one place to another, within the jurisdiction of the United States."

And on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments agreed to, ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

Friday, February 13.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. Early, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise;" which was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

[This bill specifies certain articles which shall not be considered as embraced by the provisions of the original act, and gives the Secretary of the Treasury and Comptroller power to decide, in case of doubt, whether any particular article is prohibited.]

The bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States, until authorized by law," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to regulate the summoning of grand jurors," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. Holmes, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was committed, on the tenth instant, the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of John Chester," reported to the House their agreement to the same: Whereupon, Ordered, That the said bill and report be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to extend the time for locating Virginia military warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the office of the Secretary of the Department of War. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Stephen Sayre. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill respecting seizures made under the authority of the United States, and for other purposes. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate, entitled, "An act establishing circuit courts, and abridging the jurisdiction of the district courts in the districts of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio." The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be read the third time to-morrow.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. J. Randolph, in the name of the Committee of Ways and Means, asked leave to report a bill in relation to the public debt, being an addition to the bill, passed at the present session, supplementary to the act, entitled "An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States."

Mr. R. observed that the object of the bill was to provide for the case of a refusal on the part of the holders of three per cent. stock to come into the loan proposed by the act recently passed. Its object was, to use a strong phrase, to coerce them into that loan; not, however, by any provisions that involved the least breach of the public faith. Its object was to make provision for paying off such part of the three per cent. stock as should remain unsubscribed to the new loan by an annuity of four per centum. Such an annuity would be worth something more than sixty-two per cent. Of course, as the new loan permitted the creditor to subscribe at the rate of sixty-five per cent., it would become obviously his interest to accept the terms of the loan.

Mr. R. then presented the bill, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight," together with the amendments agreed to yesterday, were read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 5, as follows:

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Mr. Mumford rose to offer certain resolutions, which he begged leave to introduce after a few remarks.

Some gentlemen, said Mr. M., say we are at peace. Others tell us it will be time to prepare for war on the approach of danger. Such language is to me truly surprising. Look at the desolating state of Europe. Who knows how soon the tempest of war may be extended to this country and involve us in the like danger and calamity? I hope we shall follow, in my opinion it is our duty to follow the example of the sages and patriots who have gone before us; and who have told us that the method of avoiding danger and war is to be always prepared in time of peace.

Will this House consent to see the master key of our country in the hands of an enemy? It is true that the brave and independent spirit of the nation will prevail at last, but infinite evil would result from the capture of New York by an enemy, in point of private property, revenue, and the effectual use of the national force. Gentlemen who complain that $200,000 is a sum too small, and yet oppose this partial, specific appropriation for New York, cannot reconcile their inconsistency. The channel in the narrowest place is but 1,400 yards across. Two batteries on Montalembert's plan, together with Archibald Robinson's boom, would, I am persuaded, form an adequate defence. This might be done for less than $500.000. A gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. D. R. Williams) has told the House that Charleston is ten thousand times more exposed than New York. This I believe is a mistake. There is a straight broad channel from the sea up to the very city of New York, and a ship-of-the-line may at any time come up and lay her broadside before us.

I am no lawyer, and cannot therefore point out exactly the propriety of the law of 1794, which was cited on a former day by the gentleman from Connecticut, and which designates the eighteen ports that are proper to be fortified. If, however, the gentleman will specify any ports in Connecticut, which are in need of fortification like New York, I am very ready to agree to an appropriation for that purpose. The House has this session passed a bill for the defence of New Orleans, making specific appropriations. We ask for like measures of defence for the security of New York.

Mr. M. then proposed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding —— dollars be appropriated, to enable the President of the United States more effectually to fortify the port of New York.

Resolved, That a further sum, not exceeding —— dollars, be appropriated to enable the President of the United States to fortify the ports of Charleston, South Carolina and Norfolk.

Resolved, That, in addition to the sums heretofore granted by law, a further sum, not exceeding —— dollars, be appropriated to enable the President of the United States to fortify such other places as he may think conducive to the public security.

The Speaker, said the first resolution was not in order, as a similar resolution, offered by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Varnum,) was now on the table.

Mr. Varnum observed that the resolutions were different. The one which he had offered proposed a specific sum, $100,000—this is blank.

The Speaker still thought the resolution not in order.

Mr. Varnum declared that he had no wish to embarass the gentleman from New York, in procuring competent measures for the defence of that city. He then withdrew his resolution.

On motion of Mr Mumford the House proceeded to consider the resolutions—ayes 69.

Mr. Mumford moved that they be referred to the Committee of the Whole, to whom was referred the bill, appropriating $20,000 for the repair of fortifications.

Mr. Dana.—I know not that I have much objection to the reference proposed by the gentleman from New York (Mr. Mumford,) but if the resolutions are ordered to lie on the table his purpose will be as effectually answered as by the reference proposed. Some observations, however, which have fallen from the gentleman, seem entitled to notice.

When this subject was before the House on a former day, I took the liberty of referring to a law passed in 1794. If the gentleman from New York has never read that law, I think it would be well for him to look at it before he undertakes to propose to this House measures relative to the fortification of our ports and harbors. That law designates eighteen or twenty ports and harbors in the United States to be fortified, but makes no appropriation for the purpose.

In point of system I am wholly opposed to any partial specific appropriations. Grant the money and leave the distribution of it to the Executive. He has better means of information than this House. As to the State of Connecticut, I am not weak enough to attempt what the gentleman has proposed as a task for me to perform. I consider the effectual defence of New York as a barrier for Connecticut. I oppose the specific grant, because I am confident it is not adequate to the object. I oppose it because I wish extensive and permanent measures to be adopted for the protection of places exposed to danger; and because I am unwilling to see a great system frittered down by this petty competition between different ports. The gentlemen who are so strenuous for this plan, if they understand the general course of proceedings, must know that they will meet with constant difficulty in every stage of the business. The gentlemen must know that they will never succeed in any such partial, frivolous attempt. It is the very way to make the project of defence unpopular, and goes to sacrifice the object which they profess to pursue. It is on this ground that I oppose the reference of this resolution. These remarks I have thought fit to make in reply to the gratuitous observations of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Mumford.—To show that we have acted on the idea of specific appropriations, I will read a bill which we have passed in this House this very session, for the protection of New Orleans.

Mr. M. read the bill.

Mr. Dana—The reply to what has been read by the gentleman from New Orleans, is very obvious. New Orleans is not comprehended in the law of 1794, and the President, therefore, could not apply moneys appropriated for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States, to the fortification of New Orleans, without a special act for this purpose. It is not so with New York.

Mr. Masters.—If the best course is to leave it to the Executive to distribute an appropriation among the several ports and harbors, we did wrong when we voted a specific appropriation for New Orleans. When some days since we called for a general appropriation, we were told to apply for a specific one. Now, when we call for a specific appropriation, we are told, this is the wrong way: We ought to apply for a general one. And in this way we are to get none at all. For my part, I am in favor of a specific grant, not because I have not confidence in the Executive, but because I think it the most proper and the best way. We are then more sure that the money will be laid out right.

Mr. Dana moved that the resolution lie on the table.

The Speaker, after consulting the rules of the House, declared that the question of commitment must be first put.

Mr. Eppes said that it might perhaps be proper to grant some additional sum for the defence of New York; but he could perceive no reason for going now into a general system of defence when no such measures are called for, except by New York.

If there is any principle, said Mr. E., which ought to be hooted at in a Republican Government it is the very principle laid down by the gentleman from New York (Mr. Mumford) as the basis of his reasoning—that to preserve peace we ought to be prepared for war. Sir, it is this very principle which is the source of all the miseries of Europe. Until 1794 the affairs of our country went on peaceably. Then this destructive principle extended itself into our National Councils. Then ensued the long train of armies, navies, fortifications, with all their concomitant evils. Sir, this very principle has cost the nation more than fifty millions of dollars. And what is the benefit? Has it ever done the least good?

I do not like the plan of the gentleman. It is calculated, as the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Dana) has truly stated, to defeat the object which he has in view. Experience shows it. I call for a division of the question, as I will agree to vote for the first resolution, but I am against the others.

The Speaker observed that he should accordingly put the question separately upon each resolution.

Mr. Quincy.—When a motion was, the other day, laid on the table, for a specific appropriation of a hundred thousand dollars, for the fortification of New York, with the honorable gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Dana) I urged some objections to appropriations of that description. As the gentleman from New York (Mr. Mumford) has suggested that there is some inconsistency between those objections and our former anxiety for large appropriations for the defence of the commercial cities, I feel compelled to make some observations on the subject.

I acknowledge, sir, that when that motion was made in this House, it excited in me some surprise, and no little suspicion. Its nature and origin were natural causes of both, under the circumstances with which they were attended. What was the proposition? A specific appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars for the harbor of New York. And from whom? From my honorable colleague (Mr. Varnum.) A gentleman not distinguished for his zeal in favor of large general appropriations, and who has, if I mistake not, more than once expressly declared his disbelief in the practicability of an efficient fortification of this particular harbor! It was impossible not to apprehend, that a motion of this nature, originating in such a quarter, was indicative of some great change in the views of the prevailing influence on this floor. My colleague is a distinguished member of this House. He is a friend and intimate of the Secretary of War, who is not remarkable for his friendship to large general appropriations for such objects, or for his belief in the practicability of efficient fortifications, in this particular harbor. The same dispositions, it is generally understood, are entertained in a quarter where my colleague is so loved and honored, that he has in consequence acquired almost an official character on this floor. A motion of such a nature as this, originating with a gentleman so connected, was a natural source of jealousy and curiosity. It was impossible not to ask—how happens this? What has produced such a sudden and great change, from twenty thousand dollars for the fortification of all the ports and harbors in the United States, New York included, to a hundred thousand dollars for this single harbor? To what is this new faith to be attributed? Is it instantaneous regeneration? or is it progressive illumination? If the former, who has worked the miracle? What has purged the visual ray? If the latter, why have we not had the course of reasoning, the logical illustration, by which this great truth has been so recently discovered.

I have since had something that looks like light thrown upon this mystery. Certain things are circulating in whispers, which, apparently, may have some relation to this new current, which has just begun to set on this floor. I would, however, not be understood as intimating that what I am now going to state were the motives of my honorable colleague. I mean only to regret with him, that this great conversion, which his motion indicates, has happened at a moment, and under circumstances, so unpropitious to a perfect confidence in its principle. Sir, it has been stated to me, in such a way that I cannot but believe it, that this subject of fortifications has become a great party question in the State of New York—that it has been seized upon and wielded by the different political divisions of that State as an engine of popularity. It has also been intimated to me, that it is absolutely necessary that something should be effected in the way of appropriations for that city, to enable the influences, lately there prevalent, to maintain their past ascendency. And it is certain, that the motion of my honorable colleague was laid upon the table, I think, the day after, but at any rate, a very short time after the news had arrived in this city, of certain proceedings which have taken place at Albany. Without attributing any motives to my colleague, or his political friends, he will give me leave to lament with him these unfortunate circumstances, which have attended his motion. It is truly to be regretted that such a memorable conversion to the true faith did not happen under circumstances which could leave no doubt as to the spirituality of the views of the converts; instead of happening under such as give too many reasons to suspect worldly considerations.

Anxious as I am for large and honorable appropriations for the defence of the seaboard and cities; believing, as I do, that protection is their right, and our duty, and that it is entirely within our ability; I do now, unequivocally and without any reserve, declare my utter dissent to their scheme of specific appropriations, for individual cities. I warn gentlemen who have the real interests of the commercial cities at heart, against ever acceding to them. I deem such a system a virtual abandonment of their rights, and, in effect, a forfeiture of all their hopes.

Sir, what is our object? Is it not permanent, substantial defence, adopted on the principle of the importance of commercial deposits, begun on an adequate scale, pursued regularly, and terminating with nothing short of such protection as the nature of their respective positions renders practicable?

How is this object to be attained? By dividing our interests and by submitting to become solitary applicants for special favors? By scrambling, each according to its strength, after specific appropriations? No, sir. But as all other great and national interests are pursued and obtained; by combining all those, whose principles and interests are similar, in common exertions for the attainment of the common object; by suffering no division to take place among us; by establishing our rights on solid principles and maintaining them firmly; by making the greatness of the interest understood by the people; by being intelligently zealous, constitutionally urgent. These are the means which render success the most certain, and by which it will be the best deserved.

But let the honorable association once be broken, let the principal members of the interest be exclusively served, and what security for the rest? If with all her zeal, her weight, and her exertions, combined with ours, we have as yet been able to effect absolutely nothing, what possible hopes can we entertain of success, after her ardour shall be blunted by specific satisfaction? The consequence of abandoning the system of general appropriations is undeniably this—cities are reduced from a great, powerful, legitimate influence, arising from their national importance and the greatness of their common interest, to the humble level of common petitioners, courting the patronage of leading members on this floor, and licking the dust before every accidental majority which may prevail upon it. The question of fortifications or no fortifications, will be made to depend, not upon the wealth, the numbers, or the exposure of the particular city, but upon the political sect there prevalent; and perhaps a change in their political sentiments will be made the condition on which defence shall be extended.

Do I mean to deny that New York is entitled to the first attention, and to the largest share of whatever appropriation may be made? Certainly not. The question of apportionment belongs to the Executive discretion. It is wisely and may safely there be deposited. Unquestionably New York has the greatest claim and the most urgent. She has more wealth, numbers, and exposure, than any other city. But this is not the only city which has wealth, inhabitants, or exposure. Nor is she, nor ought she to be more dear to us, or more covered by the national wing than any other city; except in proportion to her excess in each of those particulars. Why then will she, by accepting of a specific appropriation, withdraw herself from a common interest, as if the right was exclusive, and not in proportion to her share in that interest?

But the gentleman from New York (Mr. Mumford) says "we will vote for you, if you will vote for us." And yet, at the very moment, he knows, that the same gentleman who would, in that case, join us, in voting for New York, would abandon us, in the very vote for every other city. As an evidence of which, he had scarcely sat down, when the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Eppes,) who is one of the new converts, told us expressly, that although he was willing to give something for New York, he would not vote an appropriation for any other city.

Sir, if the proposed appropriation was adequate to the entire fortification of the harbor of New York, there would be some apology for its representatives, in thus yielding to the current and getting what they could under a temporary influence. But is a hundred thousand dollars all that they want? Will they be satisfied with that? They know they will not. But if the gentleman from New York are content, I am free to declare, that I am not. As a citizen of these United States, as one of the representatives of this nation, having, in common with every other citizen, a deep stake in the prosperity and the safety of the commercial capital of my country, I do protest against all fortifications for that harbor commenced upon a hundred thousand dollars scale, and limited in extent by that expenditure. That city deserves, and has a right to many times one hundred thousand dollars, for such an object. And the time is not distant, as I believe, when, in the regular course of general appropriations, in common with other commercial cities, she might obtain the requisite sums. But then it can only happen upon the principle of her not abandoning the common interest, and disdaining to accept any sum upon a system which has only the accommodation of a particular and a temporary influence for its basis. At any rate, let the gentlemen from New York remember—if they get a hundred thousand dollars upon the principle of specific appropriation, they will never get anything more. The mouths of the advocates of that city are closed. They have admitted the principle of individual application and supply, and they must abide by the consequences. Until every other city in the United States has had a proportionate advance, with what face can New York pretend to anything additional? And if a vote can be obtained to leave other cities without future appropriations, New York can lay no claim to any additional assistance.

If the commercial cities are ever protected, it can only be by their adherence to each other; their claim for protection, on a common principle, supported by their united interest, and by the natural and just weight which their wealth, enterprise, and numbers, always ought to command in this nation.

Mr. Varnum.—It is very easy for gentlemen to make false statements of facts to this House and then to draw their own inferences.

According to the best of my recollection (and if I am mistaken I wish to be corrected) I have spoken but once on the subject of fortifications. At that time I took a view of the sums which have been heretofore appropriated for this purpose, but I expressed no opinion that $20,000 was a sum large enough to put New York in a complete state of defence. The House had previously decided on that subject, and I therefore studiously avoided that question. And my colleague (Mr. Quincy) knows it. I said it would be in my opinion impracticable to fortify New York against a large fleet, but I maintained the practicability of fortifying it against marauders and picaroons, and I declared myself willing to go as far as was necessary to secure that object.

As to the jealousy of my colleague that some proceedings at Albany might have influenced me in bringing forward my resolution, I must suppose it altogether an imagination of his own mind. What secret information he may have had, I know not; but for myself, I declare I heard nothing of any proceedings at Albany till the day after.

I am willing that my colleague should entertain all the suspicion that he chooses concerning my character or conduct. It is not in his power to degrade me from the standing which I hold in society. I was risking my life and spending my property in defence of my country, when my colleague was rocking in his cradle. I have always been and shall continue to be willing to vote whatever sums I think necessary for the defence of the country. I shall say nothing of my services or of those of my colleague, and I am perfectly willing that he should indulge any suspicions in regard to my motives, as they will neither disturb the tranquillity of my mind nor alter the course of my conduct.

Mr. Quincy.—I made no allusion to any particular speech of that gentleman (Mr. Varnum) but only stated my general impressions from his language, and from the course of his conduct on this floor. I said, he was not distinguished for his zeal for large general appropriations for the commercial cities, and that, if I mistook not, he had expressed a disbelief in the practicability of an efficient defence for the harbor of New York. If my colleague will declare that he has been zealous for such appropriations, or that he has been a uniform believer in the practicability of such defence, I am ready to retract my opinion.

As to its being my design to degrade my colleague, nothing was further from my intentions. I intimated that he was eminently beloved and honored by the Executive of the United States. Is that degradation?

Mr. Masters.—The gentleman from Massachusetts, who has just sat down, contended, at the last session, unless I am much mistaken, for a specific appropriation. Now he is against it. If his colleague (Mr. Varnum) is against a specific appropriation, he seems to be for it. If his colleague is for it, he is therefore, a fortiori, against it. The gentleman says this is a great party question in the State of New York. He is mistaken; all parties are united on the subject. They all wish to see New York well fortified.

The question being taken on committing the first resolution, which relates to New York only, it was carried—yeas 63.

The second resolution, relating to Charleston, South Carolina, and Norfolk, was then read.

Mr. D. R. Williams.—I do hope, as a Representative of the State of South Carolina, that this resolution will not be agreed to. If any measures are now, or should be hereafter necessary to the security of Charleston, I have full confidence in the General Government. I believe this partial course is not calculated to operate for our benefit. If we are to be marked out as objects of special favor, I fear the citizens of North Carolina and Georgia will not so readily fly to our assistance. I wish not that we should partake of the odium that will be excited by this course. It tends to endanger our safety whenever we may be menaced with attack.

Mr. Dana called for the reading of the law, passed March 20, 1794, entitled "An act to provide for the defence of the ports and harbors of the United States." [This law was read. It designates twenty principal ports in the United States, which it directs the President to cause to be fortified.]

Mr. Marion observed that he had, on a former occasion, stated the reasons why he had not called the attention of the House to the defenceless situation of Charleston. The gentleman from New York (Mr. Mumford) is much mistaken, said Mr. M., if he attributes our silence to an insensibility to our danger. I hope that Charleston will not be regarded as a cloak, or a make-weight, to obtain assistance for New York. I voted for the first resolution, which related to New York, but I hope this resolution will not be referred.

Mr. Mumford withdrew the resolution relative to Charleston.

Mr. Newton observed that he had not been clamorous on the subject of fortifications, because he had a full reliance on the House. He was satisfied that whenever the subject should be finally acted upon, the place from which he came (Norfolk) would not be postponed to other places, but all would be provided for according to their necessities. The large sum of duties which has been so often stated to be collected in New York, is paid, not merely by citizens of that city, or that State. North Carolina, South Carolina, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and some other States, contribute largely to the payment of duties collected at New York. All our ports and harbors are as much entitled as New York to the justice of the House.

The third resolution was read.

Mr. J. Randolph inquired if a motion to amend the resolution were in order?

The Speaker replied that it was not.

Mr. J. Randolph.—The diction is defective.

Mr. Speaker.—A motion to amend is not in order when a motion to commit is pending.

Mr. D. R. Williams hoped the resolution would be withdrawn. The House can put any sum that may be thought proper into the bill relative to the subject of fortifications.

Mr. Marion also expressed a wish that the motion would be withdrawn.

After some conversation between the Speaker and Mr. J. Randolph, whether the resolution could be withdrawn without leave, as the House had already acted on two resolutions which were part of the original motion—Mr. Mumford withdrew the resolution.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for finishing the south wing of the Capitol, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. Lewis, the first blank was filled with $25,000, which sum is to be applied towards finishing the south wing of the Capitol.

The next blank was in that part of the bill which makes an appropriation to furnish the Representative Chamber for the accommodation of the House.

Mr. Lewis moved to fill the blank with $20,000. On this motion considerable debate arose.

Mr. Jackson, of Virginia, wished to know why so large a sum was proposed.

Mr. Gregg, of Pennsylvania, asked, if the whole sum would be wanted the present year? The Legislature had been there seven years, and there seemed little or no likelihood that the Capitol would be finished and ready for their use in seven years more. While one part is building another grows out of repair. It had been said, and he believed with truth, that there was danger of the walls tumbling down.

Mr. Van Cortlandt, of New York.—I am surprised, on my word. Gentlemen ask why money is wanted. If no money is granted, the Capitol will not be finished in seventy times seven years. Why, want of money is the very reason it has not been finished before.

Mr. Lewis, who was the chairman of the select committee that reported the bill, said he was no architect, and could not determine the expense of building in Washington. The select committee had agreed to the sums which had been moved, because they were stated to be necessary by the Superintendent of the public works, Mr. Latrobe. Mr. L. said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Gregg) had assigned a satisfactory reason for agreeing to the sum recommended by the committee, that, if they were not granted and repairs made, the walls would tumble down.

Mr. Jackson was unable to conceive how twenty thousand dollars could be wanted to furnish one room. If the sum is agreed to, the superintendent would think himself obliged to procure gilded chairs and plated tables. Mr. J. was in favor of economy, not of the economy of the last eight or ten years, but that of old times. Then twenty thousand dollars would have been thought sufficient both to build and furnish a house.

Mr. Findley, of Pennsylvania, expressed his opinion in favor of the motion.

Mr. Masters, of New York, observed, that they had been told, formerly, that twenty thousand dollars was enough for all the fortifications in the United States, [a loud laugh;] now, this sum is proposed to furnish us with tables and chairs. He thought it was not a good contrast.

The question on agreeing to twenty thousand dollars was lost—ayes 36, noes 61.

Mr. Jackson proposed ten thousand dollars.

Mr. D. R. Williams proposed five thousand dollars.

Mr. Cook was glad the same sum which had been proposed for fortifications, was not agreed to for furnishing a single room, on account of the name of the thing. He proposed eighteen thousand dollars. The motion was negatived—ayes 41, noes 54.

Mr. Macon (the Speaker) said, he lived in a country where they had no such expensive furniture, but, judging from the size of the room, and the length of time in which the House had been building, [a laugh,] he imagined the sum first proposed would not be too large. More than twenty thousand dollars, he believed, had been granted for furnishing the President's house. He hoped they would not spoil the room for want of one or two thousand dollars.

Mr. Lewis observed, that he had no particular concern in this subject. Perhaps he should never have again the honor of a seat in the House, and if he did he should, he believed, be as willing to sit on a stool as other gentlemen. But the present furniture would not suit the new Chamber in the south wing. There were also several committee rooms to be furnished. The money was to be expended under the direction of the President; and, from his known principles of economy, Mr. L. trusted that, however large a sum should be granted, no more would be expended than what was necessary. Judging from the expense of this House, and of the President's, he thought twenty thousand dollars would not be too much; but as the House had negatived that sum, he proposed seventeen thousand dollars.

Mr. Jackson thought the furniture of this room might suit again. If the tables were small, there would be so much the more room. The members now felt much inconvenience from being so confined in this small Chamber. As the present furniture was good for nothing else, it must, unless used by the House, be put into a bonfire. Mr. J. was against the destruction of so much property.

Mr. Smilie, of Pennsylvania, said that, when they looked back to the beginning of things there, (meaning the location of the public buildings in Washington,) they would find everything sacrificed to accommodate the owners of lots. The Capitol was placed in one part of the city, the Navy yard in another, and the President's house in another. The Capitol and the President's house are so far apart, (the distance is one mile and five-eighths,) that it is very inconvenient. Mr. S. had been against the building of the Capitol, and thought that it would be much better to lay out two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in building a brick house near the President's. But the question now is, whether they would give up the building, or vote the money. Mr. S. was in favor of the motion. The delay could not be owing to want of money, for the House had always given all that had been asked.

The question on agreeing to seventeen thousand dollars, was carried—ayes 56, noes 44.

That part of the bill which proposes to alter and repair the east side of the north wing, was next considered.

Mr. D. R. Williams moved to strike out the word "alter." He was willing to repair the north wing, but to alter it according to the plan of the Superintendent would require a great expense, without an adequate benefit.

Mr. Lyon would agree to the motion, but he feared, if it were adopted, they would never get into the south wing. It was much like the story of the carpenter's boy, who, being asked where his master was, said he had gone to look for another job. Mr. L. was afraid, if the motion was agreed to, the completing of the south wing would be delayed until the Superintendent had found another job.

Mr. D. R. Williams said, he made this motion to try the principle, whether the House would agree to the alterations contemplated in the north wing.* He knew but one reason for the change. It was to make things correspond with the parliamentary language. When a bill is sent down from the Senate to the House of Representatives, it will, if the alteration takes place, really descend, as this House will be about fifteen feet lower than the Senate. Rather than incur a great expense for this object, Mr. W. would rather alter the language and say, a bill is sent up to this House and down to the Senate.

The motion to strike out the word "alter" was agreed to—ayes 77.

Mr. Jackson moved to strike out the words, "east side of." Then the repairs would extend to the whole of the north wing, so far as they might be necessary. The House, he said, was crazy, and, if assailed by a rude attack, would certainly be demolished. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Lewis said that, if the bill had been permitted to remain as it was reported, he intended to move to fill the last blank with fifty thousand dollars, but as the Committee had determined that there should be no alteration in the north wing, and confined the appropriation to repairs, he had no estimate of the sum with which it would now be necessary to fill the blank. He must go by guess. He had understood that it would cost twenty thousand dollars to put a roof on the north wing, which was much wanted, and some other repairs were necessary. He therefore moved to fill the blank with twenty-five thousand dollars.

The motion was agreed to without a debate—ayes 62.

Fifteen thousand dollars were then proposed for improvements on the President's house and lot, and carried without a division.

The bill, as amended, was reported to the House, who concurred therein, and ordered it to a third reading to-morrow.

Monday, February 16.

Mr. Varnum, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, presented a bill to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Clay,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider the propriety of explaining the operation of the several acts of Congress relative to the Marine corps, and to the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, so far as the same may affect the Commandant of the Marine corps; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. J. Clay, Mr. Walton, and Mr. Livingston.

The Superintendent of the public buildings, in his report, proposed to make two stories of the Senate Chamber, and apply the upper one to the use of the Courts. The bill which gave rise to the debate was drawn in conformity to this idea of the Superintendent.

ing Virginia military warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the office of the Secretary of the Department of War, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill respecting seizures made under the authority of the United States, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for finishing the south wing of the Capitol, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what addition ought to be made to the existing Navy Peace Establishment; and that they be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

A committee was appointed, of Messrs. NEWTON, BROOM, MUMFORD, MARION, and COOK.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," was read twice, and committed to Messrs. J. CLAY, QUINCY, and MCCREERY.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government, during the year one thousand eight hundred and seven; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the House, of the seventh instant, "to inquire into the expediency of retaining a greater proportion of the duties on articles, the growth or manufacture of foreign countries, which may be re-exported," made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the farther consideration of a resolution of the House of Representatives, directing the Committee of Ways and Means "to inquire into the expediency of retaining a greater proportion of the duties on articles, the growth or manufacture of foreign countries, which may be re-exported," be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LEWIS, from the committee appointed on the twenty-seventh ultimo, presented a bill for the establishment of a turnpike company in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT,

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the seventh instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to reduce the expenses attending the administration of justice in the District of Columbia," be discharged from the farther consideration thereof; and that the same be committed to Mr. BASSETT, Mr. MAGRUDER, Mr. KELLY, Mr. VARNUM, and Mr. BLOUNT.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT,

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the twenty-seventh ultimo, the bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," be discharged from the farther consideration thereof; and that the same be committed to the committee last appointed.

CIRCUIT COURTS.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act establishing circuit courts in the district of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio," together with the amendments agreed to on the thirteenth instant, were read a third time: Whereupon, the bill, with amendments, was recommitted to a Committee of the Whole this day.

The House, accordingly, resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent therein, the bill and amendments was reported without amendment thereto.

The bill was then read the third time, and on the question that the same do pass? it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 7, as follows:

COAST OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on a joint resolution, of the tenth instant, "authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be published the report and chart of a survey of the coast of North Carolina, made by Thomas Coles and Jonathan Price;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the resolution without amendment.

The said resolution being again read at the Clerk's table, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be published the report and chart of a survey of the coast of North Carolina, made by Thomas Coles and Jonathan Price, under the act of Congress, passed at the last session, for that purpose; "and that the said Secretary be authorized to give the privilege of securing to themselves the copy right thereof, provided they will undertake the expense of the publication, and secure the performance of such other conditions, as he may think proper, to promote the objects of the Government in directing the said survey to be made. But such copy right shall not operate to prevent Congress from having said chart incorporated into any general chart of the coast of the United States, which they may think proper to cause to be executed."

A motion was made by Mr. OLIN, and seconded, to amend the said resolution, by striking out therefrom the following words:

"And that the said Secretary be authorized to give them the privilege of securing to themselves the copy right thereof, provided they will undertake the expense of the publication, and secure the performance of such other conditions as he may think proper, to promote the objects of the Government in directing the said survey to be made. But such copy right shall not operate to prevent Congress from having said chart incorporated into any general chart of the coast of the United States which they may think proper to cause to be executed:"

And on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said joint resolution, as amended, be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

LEWIS AND CLARKE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making compensation to Messieurs Lewis and Clarke, and their companions. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The House proceeded further to amend the said bill: When an adjournment being called for, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 17.

Ordered, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John and William Bell, presented to this House on the twenty-fourth of December last.

A motion was then made by Mr. EPPES, that the said petition, and papers accompanying the same, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury: And, on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 47, nays 47.

Mr. SPEAKER declaring himself with the nays.

Mr. J. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill further to regulate the grants of land south of the State of Tennessee; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole, on Saturday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to all the amendments, except the ninth, proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight," to which said ninth amendment they disagree.

THE WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS.

The House proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. BROOM, of the seventh instant, and the same being read in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That it is expedient to make further provision, by law, for securing the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, to persons in custody, under, or by color of, the authority of the United States."

Mr. BROOM addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: It will be recollected by the House that I had the honor of submitting a resolution to make further provision by law for securing the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus to persons in custody, under or by color of the authority of the United States. It was then my wish that it should lie upon the table, in order that members might have an opportunity of considering the subject; being fully persuaded that the more it was considered the more evident would the importance of it appear. As it now becomes my duty to call the attention of the House to the subject, I shall move that the resolution be referred to a Committee of the whole House, and I should not offer a single observation in support of this motion, but for the doubts which have been suggested by several members, of the necessity and propriety of legislative interposition at this time. I trust therefore that I shall be indulged in pointing out the necessity and importance of the provision which it is contemplated to make. I am sensible that this subject is not familiar to the majority of this House; for, until now, no circumstance has occurred in this country which could make us duly appreciate the value of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. In ordinary times, the laws which already exist may be sufficient, for in such times there is no temptation to transgress the limits of Constitutional or legal privileges; but in times of turbulence and commotion, the mere formal recognition of rights will afford too feeble a barrier against the inflamed passions of men in power, whether excited by an intemperate zeal for the supposed welfare of the country, or by the detestable motives of party rancor or individual oppression. I could have wished that circumstances had never occurred which would make it necessary to fortify, by penal laws, the Constitutional privilege of habeas corpus, and that the whole nation, from the first to the least, had regarded it with such religious veneration, that no officer, either military or civil, would have dared to violate it. But recent circumstances have proved that such a wish would have been in vain, and have demonstrated, more powerfully than any abstract reasoning, the necessity and importance of further legislative provision.

This privilege of the writ of habeas corpus has been deemed so important that, by the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution, it is declared, that it shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it. Such is the value of this privilege, that even the highest legislative body of the Union—the legitimate Representatives of the nation—are not entrusted with the guardianship of it, or suffered to lay their hands upon it, unless when, in cases of extreme danger, the public safety shall make it necessary.

The suspension of this privilege upon slight pretences, it was easily foreseen would destroy its efficacy, and if it depended on the mere will of Congress, it would become, in the hands of the majority, the most certain and convenient means to accomplish the purposes of party persecution, or to gratify political or personal rancor or animosity. This Constitutional provision was only intended as a check upon the power of Congress in abridging the privilege; but was never intended to prevent them from entrenching it around with sound and wholesome laws; on the contrary, it was expected that Congress were prohibited from impairing, at their pleasure, this privilege; that they would regard it as of high importance, and by coercive laws insure its operation. By the fourteenth section of the judiciary law, vol 1, L. U. S., page 58, power is given to certain courts and judges, to grant the writ of habeas corpus; and this is all the provision made by any act of Congress to secure this privilege. Thus the Constitution sanctions the writ, and the act of Congress gives the judges power to grant it; but there is no law of the United States which compels the judge to grant it, or the officer to obey it; and the only remedy left to the individual is that which he derives from the common law of England, (if, indeed, gentlemen will allow to that law any operation in the United States courts;) and that very law upon which we now rely to enforce the privilege was found, during the reign of Charles II., utterly insufficient, and has ever since the thirty-first year of that reign, been considered in England as only auxiliary in securing the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

The Speaker was sorry to interrupt the gentleman from Delaware, but must observe, that it was not in order to debate the motion until the House should agree to consider it.

Mr. Smilie hoped the gentleman from Delaware would be permitted to proceed, as the subject was a very important one.

Mr. Broom then moved to consider the motion of reference, to which the House agreed—ayes fifty-seven.

Mr. Broom.—I am sorry that I have trespassed upon the rules of the House. I assure the House that it was not intentional, and beg leave to offer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Smilie) my acknowledgment for his liberality. As the House has now agreed to consider the motion, I will proceed in support of it. The statute 31, chapter 2, was designed to remedy, and did effectually remedy, the defects of the common law provision on this subject. By that statute severe penalties were imposed on judges refusing to grant the writ of habeas corpus, and on all parties refusing to obey it. In most of the States, laws have been made upon the principle of the statute of Charles, and so far as they extend, are found to have the most beneficial effect in securing the privilege of the writ, but they do not extend to inflicting penalties on judges of the courts or officers of the United States. If the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus be important, and the laws be defective, it is surely our duty to apply the remedy. Of its importance, it is true we have had but little experience in our own country. In England, from whence we derive our knowledge of it, they have proved its value; they have tried it, and it has not been found wanting. In England, this inestimable privilege has been for ages the proud theme of exultation; there they worshipped it as a talismanic wand which could unbar the gates of the strongest prison and dissolve in an instant the fetters of the captive. It was to Englishmen as a wall of fire by night, shielding them from the arbitrary sway of tyrannic power. It is, indeed, the great palladium of that English civil liberty which has exalted the English character. Of the power and influence of civil liberty upon the happiness of the people of England we need no stronger evidence than the situation of surrounding nations, where it was unknown. Let us go back to less civilized times, and we shall see in those nations men in the most abject state of society, suffering oppression in every possible shape; there, every private castle was a secret and inviolable prison; there the life and liberty of the most illustrious, as well as the meanest, subject, were alike the sport of the caprice of a tyrant. Even the petty lordling held as it were the shears of fate, and cut at pleasure the thread of the life of his vassals. A lettre de cachet could confine the unhappy victim of power for life in the loathsome walls of a dungeon, and in spite of the ties of affection or blood, friends must forget each other, or share a common fate. The savage tortures of the inquisition chilled the soul with horror, and the gloomy recess of the sanctuaries of religion too often bore witness to the diabolical temper of man when inflamed with passion and unrestrained by wholesome laws. Such was the condition of other countries while the people of England were reposing in security under the protection of their civil institutions; institutions which had received the sanction of ages, and were guarded by the religious veneration of the people. The right to personal liberty, unless for the commission of an offence against law; the right to know the accusation against them, and the right to be tried by their peers, were all recognised by their charters, and which their monarchs had sworn inviolably to observe. These rights were not merely secured by parchment; they were incorporated with the habits, manners, and customs of the people; they were handed down from father to son in trust for posterity, and guarded as a precious inheritance, which could never be diminished with honor. The people were early taught to know them, and to consider it a sacred duty to draw their swords in defence of them. These fundamental rights of Englishmen have existed from their earliest ages; they were collected in a body by Edgar the Saxon; they were revised by Edward the Confessor, and were ratified by William the Conqueror; they were recognised by Magna Charta, and after the wars between Henry III., and his subjects, were confirmed by the statute of Marlborough, and never afterwards questioned. Rights thus maintained through all the convulsions of England; rights thus endeared to the nation, and engraven on the hearts of the people, and which have walked hand in hand with them through the darkest periods of their history, require no other proofs of their importance.

Yet, however important these rights may be, a few moments' reflection will satisfy us that, without the writ of habeas corpus, they could avail but little. The rights may exist as abstract rights, but the writ of habeas corpus affords the most important, if not the only means of exercising them. In vain does the law proclaim that no man shall be imprisoned contrary to law, if the party imprisoned has no access to a tribunal, to decide the question of legality. In vain does the law promise a trial by peers, if the imprisoned party can have no access to a tribunal where he may demand such trial. In short, without the writ of habeas corpus, rights of personal liberty, however solemnly proclaimed, would exist but in name. This writ of habeas corpus is coeval with the rights which it secures. It existed by the force of common law until the subtleties of lawyers had nearly refined it away, when it was aided by the statute of Charles, and has since been found fully adequate to produce the desired effect. If, then, this privilege of the writ of habeas corpus has been productive of the most salutary effects in England, in guarding the liberty of the subject, we have the strongest proof which we can require of its importance to us, except our own experience. It is true we live under a form of Government where the sovereignty is acknowledged to belong to the people; but, let us not vainly imagine that we have no necessity for laws restrictive upon men in power. Under the fair semblance of republicanism has often been practised the most detestable tyranny, and the mild laws of a Republic have too often afforded a shelter for knaves and tyrants, instead of a shield for the virtuous and oppressed. I ask, then, of this House, to hedge round this valuable privilege of the writ of habeas corpus with efficient laws. I beg them to profit by the experience of others, and grow wise in time. Let it not be said that we are less jealous of our personal liberty than the people of England, or, that the important privilege which guards it is less dear to us, because we have not, like them, waded through blood to maintain it. Let us, with the Constitution, acknowledge the importance and sanctity of the privilege, and proceed without delay to fortify it with penal statutes. The warnings which we have lately received, call loudly on us to guard against it more effectually in future. It has been too generally our misfortune to wait until offences have been committed, before we have provided a punishment; but, when such offences have been committed, the public attention has been awakened, and laws have been passed to guard against them in future. The violations of our Constitutional privileges at New Orleans, have shown clearly the insufficiency of existing laws and the imperious necessity of providing the remedy. If we will not be roused from our slumbers by the experience which we have had, I shall despair that we will ever be awakened to any sensibility of our personal rights—for, let it be remembered, that these abuses are not of an ordinary character—they have been committed by a military officer at the head of the Army of the United States, and in full view of the highest authorities of the Union. The civil authority at New Orleans has been trampled under foot, and the commander of the army, in the plenitude of his power, avows his disobedience to laws and Constitution, and takes on himself all the responsibility of the violation of our Constitutional rights of personal liberty. Lost in amazement at this bold and unprecedented stretch of power, we can scarcely be sensible of its extent, unless we contrast it deliberately with the Constitution. The Constitution declares that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation; that no citizen shall be deprived of his liberty without due process of law; and, that the accused shall enjoy the right of a speedy trial by a jury of the district where the offence was committed. Yet, in defiance of all these Constitutional provisions, our citizens have been arrested without any warrant, and without any process of law whatever; deprived of their liberty; confined in military prisons, and transported, under military guards, two thousand miles from the place where the offence was committed. The Constitutional privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, which is to secure these rights to the citizen, has been treated with contempt, and a military officer vauntingly takes upon himself all the responsibility of wilful disobedience to the writ. For all these violations, we are to be told that the conspiracy which existed in that country will afford a sufficient justification. With respect to the conspiracy, whatever might have been its contemplated extent, we have reason to believe that it is now at an end. And, without determining whether the aspect which it had at New Orleans was really alarming to the General, or whether any circumstances do exist which may palliate his conduct, this much we all know, that his power was employed in the arbitrary violation of the rights of the citizen, and that the conspiracy is to furnish the justification. Such conduct, and even such a justification, I look upon with abhorrence and dread. For, if, upon every alarm of conspiracy, our rights of personal liberty are to be entrusted to the keeping of a military commander, we may prepare to take our leave of them forever. For my own part, I wish to live under a Government of laws, and not of men; for, however pure and upright be the intentions of our military commanders, however virtuous, and even unsuspected be their conduct, I can never agree that my right to personal liberty shall depend on their forbearance and discretion. I know not whether these men that have been arrested are innocent or guilty of the treason with which they are charged, but, whether innocent or guilty, they must be arrested and tried according to law. However atrocious the crime which has been committed, the punishment must be according to law. For, in transgressing the limits of the law to revenge upon a criminal the wrongs of society, we are guilty of injustice both to society and the criminal. The manner and circumstances attending these arrests, have been of the most uncommon kind. It is said that all intercourse between one of the prisoners and his family and friends, was cut off, and that not a soul, except military men, was suffered to approach him; that, after being detained under close military confinement for nearly two weeks, he was transported, by the way of Baltimore to this city, and that, upon his arrival here, he was informed that there was no evidence to support any charge against him whatever. But whether this man, or the others who have been arrested, are guilty, or not, it can have no influence upon our deliberations at this time. For, if even these violations now affect only the guilty, they may, at the discretion of the military officer, be extended to the innocent. It is enough for us to know that the rights of personal liberty, guarantied by the Constitution, have been openly violated in the person of a citizen of the United States, and that no laws exist sufficiently effectual to prevent or to punish such violations. It then becomes our duty, as faithful guardians of the public rights, to interpose our authority in order to preserve them. But, if we content ourselves with tamely looking on, while our best rights are trampled upon, we become partakers of the guilt by the encouragement which we give the offenders. For these violations, what remedy has the most innocent individual against the officer who arrested and transported him? As the laws of the United States have provided none, his remedy is at common law. He must sue for false imprisonment, and it depends entirely on the jury to say whether they will give him anything or nothing. Can a remedy so uncertain prevent the offence? or, will a remedy so precarious, always remunerate the injured? But, if to this, we add exemplary penalties, we have, surely, an additional security that the laws will be obeyed. The laws are not, and in my opinion will not be sufficient, unless they punish in the most prompt and exemplary manner all judges who refuse to grant the writ of habeas corpus, and all officers who refuse to obey it. For such offences, ruin ought to stare a man in the face; and, when he has so seriously abused his power, he ought to be stripped of it forever. But, if we have no laws to guard us against these abuses, and are unwilling to make any, we take upon ourselves all the responsibility of future violations.

I wish, and propose to entrench our privileges with the most vigorous laws—such as will suffer no man to violate them with impunity. There is no citizen of the United States, however abject his condition in society, in whose person the Constitutional rights of personal liberty are not sacred; and, however exalted the situation of the person who tramples upon them, or however plausible the pretence, the punishment ought to be prompt, certain, and exemplary.—Dangerous, indeed, will be the situation of our country, if every alarm of conspiracy is to be followed with the seizure and transportation of our citizens at the will of a military commander, and in defiance of the civil authority. If such a doctrine be looked upon, not only without abhorrence, but even with approbation, how easy will be the transition from lawful, to lawless power! Leaving the examples of ancient times—where the rumors of conspiracies have raised in an instant the body-guards of tyrants—we have seen, in modern France, the cry of conspiracy made the signal of massacre, or the pretext for some violent usurpation of power. I do not pretend to say that this conspiracy has been fomented or permitted from any sinister views. It is enough to point out the danger to be apprehended from suffering this dark and dangerous machine of conspiracy, to be any apology for the violation of all the most solemn Constitutional rights of personal liberty. Having witnessed the defects of our laws, and the dangerous abuses of our most valuable privileges, let us proceed to provide the remedies. Rights so important cannot be too strongly guarded, and violations so serious cannot be too strictly prohibited.

Mr. Burwell said he had determined to vote for the reference of the resolution, that the mover might suggest any additional security to the personal liberty of the citizen he thought necessary, although he did not believe a change in the law material, or that one essential provision had been omitted. Had the gentleman from Delaware confined his remarks to the subject of his motion, and avoided observations unconnected with his ostensible object, he should have acquiesced silently. The Constitution of the United States recognises the writ of habeas corpus, without determining in what manner it shall be enforced in the courts. That can only be ascertained by recurring to the acts of Congress in 1789, establishing a Judicial system, organizing courts, and fixing their powers. The fourteenth section of that law relates to this writ, and says: "This and all 'other writs not specially provided for by statute 'shall be issued agreeable to the principles and 'usage of law." Mr. B. contended the principles here alluded to could only be those of the English law, and the usages those of their courts; otherwise there could not be found in the Constitution, or laws of the Union, a single sentence relative to the subject, and the decisions heretofore had in our courts would be consequently illegal. He said he was fully justified in this position by the uniform proceedings in the courts, and particularly those which had recently taken place in this district before the court acting expressly under the laws of Congress. To show how ample the provisions were, he referred to Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 137, statute Charles 2d, "Any prisoner may move for and obtain his writ of habeas corpus, &c., and the Lord 'Chancellor or Judges denying the same on sight 'of the warrant or oath, that the same is refused, 'shall forfeit to the party grieved, the sum," &c. The judge is here compelled, under heavy penalties, to afford relief to all persons who apply for the writ, and we shall presently see the law guard against delay or evasion by farther limitations on the discretion of the judges. Mr. B. said he admitted the specific penalties of the statute did not attach to the judges and courts of this country; but it established their duties, and the punishment inflicted is regulated by the Constitution and law of the United States applicable to judicial offences and misdemeanors. The same statute provides, "that officers and keepers neglecting to make due 'returns, or not delivering to the prisoner or his 'agent a copy of the warrant of commitment 'within six hours, or shifting the custody of the 'prisoner without sufficient authority, shall for-'feit," &c. In addition to this, the court could enforce its process by attachment, fine, and imprisonment, and call on the Executive for aid, if resistance is made. Mr. B. said this statute was considered as having completely guarded against oppression, and was expressly intended to put an end to the evasion of the judges: "The oppression of an obscure individual gave birth to the 'famous habeas corpus act, 31st Charles 2d, which 'is frequently considered as another magna charta 'of the Kingdom, and by consequence and analogy has also in subsequent times reduced the general method of proceeding on these writs, and '(though not within the reach of that statute by 'issuing merely at common law) to the true 'standard of law and liberty." Black. Com. 136. What more is requisite? Your courts are compelled to issue process and grant relief; your officers to carry it into effect, and your citizens to obey. Mr. B. observed, it appeared to him impossible to devise additional provisions, when those already incorporated into the jurisprudence of the country by the act of Congress, and exercised by the courts, embrace every case arising under the laws, and extend to all persons confined under the authority or color of authority of the United States. He, however, was not a professional man, and was therefore the more disposed in favor of the commitment, lest he should be mistaken in his impressions. If the gentleman from Delaware should discover any salutary alterations, he should not only receive his vote but his thanks.

We have been told, said Mr. B., that all the States have passed laws upon this subject. Does it follow we have none? Certainly not. They have enacted the provisions of this statute specifically; we have adopted them by reference; each mode is equally good, and affords equal protection to individual rights. Indeed, it is incredible we should have remained until the present time ignorant of this chasm in our institutions; and whatever the gentleman may say, the recent events at New Orleans are not the first in this country which would have announced its existence. As far back as 1795, a distinguished citizen, during the insurrection of Pennsylvania, was seized by the military, carried to Philadelphia, and committed to jail without a mittimus, and kept three months in confinement. Notwithstanding repeated applications for the writ of habeas corpus every effort was evaded during that period, and at length, when he was brought before the court, not a particle of evidence was exhibited to justify his imprisonment, or impeach his patriotism; but, on the contrary, Mr. B. said he would assert with confidence the affidavits produced acquitted him of all guilt in the insurrection, and proved he had exerted his great influence to moderate the discontent, and quiet the apprehensions, and restrain the violence of the people. If this statement was denied, Mr. B. said he could substantiate its truth; the case had been reported, and now formed a precedent in the Supreme Court of the United States, which had been frequently cited during the present term. Why has the vigilance of gentlemen reposed so long? Why has this early and impressive intimation been disregarded, if the law was defective? The gentleman from Delaware says, the late arrests at New Orleans by the military are early warnings of the danger of standing armies. Mr. B. accepted the hint, and hoped the gentleman would himself recollect and profit by it. Those who acted with him had long been partial to those establishments, and blind to their tendency. The events alluded to proved the indispensable necessity of preserving them subordinate to the civil authority. This proved the importance of reducing the standing army to the lowest point compatible with the safety of the frontiers. This was the reason which induced him during the present session to vote against the proposed augmentation of our forces; and while he continued to entertain his present opinions, and felt his present jealousies of a conflict between the civil and military power, he was determined to avoid the issue by keeping the latter in complete subordination. If an opposite policy should ever become ascendant in this country, the measures at New Orleans, instead of being temporary, will be entailed upon us. Mr. B. said he thought it improper to mention the events which had occurred at New Orleans. It was extremely probable prosecutions would be commenced against the officer, and any expressions of disapprobation in that House would give a tone to public opinion which justice required should as yet be suspended. Every person admitted the Commander-in-chief had violated the law. He admitted it himself, and assigned reasons of justification which we ought not to decide, but leave to the courts of justice. They are the proper tribunals to punish those who infringe the rights of the citizen; and until they are closed by power, or their decrees set at defiance, and the Executive unable to enforce them, legislative interference cannot be necessary. It has been said, every officer who refuses to obey the writ of habeas corpus from a court should be punished with death; and this has been proposed as an effectual provision to secure the benefit of this writ. Has the gentleman so soon forgotten the doctrine advanced on that side of the House, and assented to during the present session, when we were told a military officer knew no law but the orders of his superior; when we were told the contrary was monstrous, absurd, and subversive of all subordination in the army; that they were not lawyers versed in your laws and Constitution? Mr. B. hoped he had. But the gentleman from Delaware had run into exactly the opposite extreme, by placing the highest and lowest officer upon the same footing, exacting from both the same knowledge of the law, attaching the same responsibility, and, contrary to every principle of justice and humanity, punishing with the same severity the man who intentionally and knowingly violates the law, and the man who ignorantly commits a breach of duty. It would completely reverse what has been so long and wisely recognised in our criminal jurisprudence. The redress allowed to a man who has been forcibly seized and imprisoned without legal authority under the existing laws, is much more conformable to equity than this mode. It is an offence against an individual's rights, and should be punished, like all other injuries of a personal nature, by action and recovery of damages, in which the jury will always have a just regard to the rank of the offender, the innocence of the victim, and the wantonness of the violence. They will discriminate between the lawless exercise of power by the Commander-in-chief and the subaltern, who executes what he supposes he is bound by his oath to perform. Mr. B. said the mover of this resolution had expressed more alarm at the situation of this country than was real, or than he supposed was felt by any member of this House. One would imagine that the arrests at Orleans had extended through the whole nation, and that no man was safe from persecution. As far as he had understood, the moment those arrested had reached the United States, they had been turned over to the courts, and every privilege been extended to them. The people of this country can never be in danger while their Representatives remain pure, and are disposed to withhold from the Executive dictatorial powers. Have we not already, during the present session, given the most honorable pledge to our constituents that we are not inattentive to their security, when we rejected the bill to suspend the writ of habeas corpus? Why talk of the lettres de cachet which have issued in France, and of other oppressions in that nation? Our Government is neither actuated by such passions, nor invested with such powers. It is degrading to assimilate the two Governments, and argue from a similarity which does not and cannot exist. The one is composed of responsible agents; the other is despotic, cruel, unrelenting, and corrupt.

Mr. Epps observed that whenever he should feel less attachment to the personal right of the citizen than the gentleman from Delaware, or any other member of the House, he hoped that those by whom he was elected would select some representative more worthy of their confidence. If the gentleman was really sincere in the principles he had advanced, he tendered to him his congratulations on his conversion to Democracy. If, on the contrary, his new principles were assumed like a Sunday coat, to be laid aside in the evening, it would afford one more example of the truth of the observation made by the celebrated Burke, that the same party can at one period trample on the rights of the citizen, and at another become declaimers in favor of personal liberty. He did not consider the resolution as designed to remedy any defect in our laws, but to afford an opportunity to gentlemen who care not much about personal rights, to make some noise about them. He considered it as a portion of the same spirit which had manifested itself in the courts below. Who are there the champions of human right? The ex-Attorney General of the United States; the leader of 1798 and 1799 turned Jacobin, changing his political catechism, and become the dupe of his own eloquence! To crown the climax, behold another noble champion of human right—the ex-Attorney General of Maryland; the very man who turned down the leaves of the "Prospect Before Us"—marked the passages which breathed too much freedom—drew in cold blood an indictment at one hundred and fifty miles from the scene of action, and became a volunteer in the godly work of persecution! When the personal right of the citizen shall depend on a mandate like this, liberty will indeed be in danger. If ever the Goddess of Liberty should meet his foul embrace, she will not be defiled only, but strangled. The greatest monster in human shape is, a tyrant in principle, with the Rights of Man in his mouth. A wretch sunk to the last step in the political ladder, and willing again to mount by principles he never felt.

Where has this zeal of a certain party for the rights of man so long slumbered? Where was it when the sedition law was passed? Where was it when a member of this House was imprisoned and deprived of his Constitutional privilege for printing a letter from the Secretary of War, acknowledged to be genuine? Where was it when General Hamilton was seized in the western parts of Pennsylvania, without the shadow of authority; driven like a convicted felon before the bayonet to Philadelphia, and there imprisoned for months without the possibility of obtaining a habeas corpus? Where was this zeal when the rights of aliens were suspended, that whole class of people placed under the will of the Executive, and a power given by law to seize and ship them? Dead, sir! The rights of man were not much in fashion with the party at that time. Plots, clues to conspiracies, and a gag for the mouth of him who dared to arraign the Federal immaculacy, was then the order of the day. When I shall believe the sympathy which these men affect to feel for a character, so recently hunted by them through the community like a wolf, is sincere, I may then credit their attachment to human rights, and not till then.

The real secret in this business is, that the termination of this affair in the Western country does not suit the Federal palate. To reduce an insurrection without an army or navy is a very anti-federal thing. They do not understand, and cannot admire that kind of energy in government which derives its force from confidence and attachment on the part of the people. We have heard in former times, from high authority, that the expedition against what was termed the insurgents of Pennsylvania, was intended to try the strength of the Government; that no Government was considered safe until its forces had been called out to support its laws. We now present to the world another example. The people of our country voluntarily preferring the Government of their choice, to views of personal aggrandizement or interest, obeying peaceably the proclamation, and returning quietly to their homes as soon as the enterprise in which they were embarked appeared to be illegal. Deserting a leader inferior to no man in talents and firmness, possessing unbounded pecuniary resources, and above all, the peculiar art of attaching to him the hearts of his friends. The mines of Mexico; the wealth, the honors, held out to his followers by such a leader, could not reconcile to Americans the odious appellation of traitors. The honest and independent citizens of your country returned to their homes to cultivate that soil on which fortune had placed them, as soon as they discovered the real objects of the expedition. Behold a triumph honorable to the American character, carrying with it irresistible evidence of the firmness of our Union, and of the patriotism of the great body of our people!

But we are told that a most daring violation of human right has taken place—that men have been seized in New Orleans and shipped here for trial. Far be it from me to exaggerate or soften these acts. Such as they are, I am willing to trust them to an enlightened community. An officer has undertaken at his own responsibility to seize and send here three persons. Two of them charged on his oath with treason, or misprision of treason, and the third by him believed to be guilty. The first two on their arrival here were delivered over to the civil authority, and on solemn argument committed on a charge for treason. The other was delivered over to the civil authority also and discharged. No man will say that the conduct of the officer who seized and shipped these persons is legal. He has done an illegal act at the risk of his fortune in damages. Let the law take its course; let the individuals prosecute; let an honest jury put on one side the crime with which they are charged, and on the other, illegal arrest and shipment; let them strike the balance. If they assess damages, and it shall hereafter appear that this was a wanton and unnecessary exercise of power, the officer must suffer. If, on the contrary, it shall appear that the officer had no object in view but the public good, that he did really believe New Orleans about to be attacked by a superior force, and that these prisoners could not be safely kept there, I for one, shall not hesitate to pay the damages assessed against him. Freedom can never be endangered by an act like this, where your laws are suffered to take their natural course without suspension or interruption—where the injured individual can bring before a jury his claim for damages. What more safe, more certain, or adequate remedy can you ask for an injury done to personal freedom, than the verdict of a jury of freemen? What would be the feelings of an honest and independent jury called upon to decide a case like this, where an innocent individual of character had been seized and shipped? The damages would be such as to heal the wounded feelings of the oppressed individual, and to deter in future the commission of such an act. If, on the contrary, strong circumstances of guilt should appear against the individual, the damages would be nothing. The officer must depend on establishing before the community the purity of his motives, and the probable guilt of those on whom he has exercised power in violation of right. If the individuals seized and sent here shall be found to be innocent, I should wish them to recover heavy damages. Under my present impressions I should certainly, if on their jury, not assess damages. If the charges made against them are well founded, I would as soon give damages against an individual who seized and secured for trial a highway robber. The public officer who knows of the existence of treason; who sees an individual embarked in schemes dishonorable to his country; who believes him aiding an approaching enemy, would deserve to be broke if he did not seize him. On the present occasion the officer has gone further—he has seized and sent them to you. He has violated the personal right of the citizen. If from honest zeal for the public good, he will find a sure protection and shield before an independent and patriotic jury. If the persons are innocent, and have been seized by him to wreak private resentment, or on any motive less pure than the public welfare, his reputation as a soldier is destroyed, and his fortune must be lost in damages. I do not believe, however, that much sympathy will be excited in the public mind, when the people shall understand about what, and about whom, all these clamors have been raised. What is the naked fact? General Wilkinson has seized and sent round to the seat of Government three persons, at a time when he believed New Orleans in danger of being attacked by a superior force. Of these persons, the one is a bankrupt foreigner, charged on oath with being an accomplice of Aaron Burr. The second, a young American, charged also on the oath of your Commander-in-chief, with having disgraced the American character, by condescending to be employed as an agent for corrupting your Army; with having actually carried proposals of bribery to your Commander-in-chief. The third, a foreign lawyer, who owes to the liberality of the people of this country his bread. Two of these persons, in good Federal times, might have been transported under the alien law to Botany Bay. But men are now seen in your courts actively denouncing this measure, who voted for and perhaps brought forward the alien law. I mention not this to justify the present proceeding, but to show to the people the spirit in which this resolution has originated. Your Commander-in-chief has been placed in a difficult situation. In daily expectation of an attack by a superior force, and opposed by the whole body of the law in the territory, a man greatly his superior in talents and firmness might have erred. He ought most certainly to have delivered over these persons to the civil authority. Had he done this, however, it is not yet decided where the trial would have been held. The district court of New Orleans has the same jurisdiction with the district court of Kentucky. The Kentucky district court has the ordinary criminal jurisdiction of a district court of the United States, which extends only to offences punishable by fine or whipping, and the whole civil jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States; so that these persons if charged with treason against the United States could not have been tried in New Orleans, and must have been sent here or elsewhere by the civil authority. Thus much for the violation of right which has taken place.

Let us now examine how far any new provision by law may be necessary to secure to the people of this country the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, which gentlemen avow to be the object of this resolution. The right as it now stands is secured to the people by the Constitution. Every judge of the United States has power to grant the writ, and every citizen of the United States is bound to obey it. But, says the gentleman, if a judge refuses it, what are you to do? The penalties of the statute of Charles the Second are not in force here. I say remove the judge from office. If your provisions on this subject are defective, amend them. Let the judge, like every other individual, feel responsibility, and he will be honest. The idea of enforcing a high responsible officer to do his duty by pecuniary fine, is a departure from the principles of our Government. No instance can be produced under the Government of an officer of trust being compelled by pecuniary fine to discharge his duty. The true principle of a republican Government is this: Dismiss from office faithless servants. But I would ask, suppose a judge violates any other right secured by the Constitution? Suppose he refuses to a citizen his Constitutional right of trial by jury, and subjects him to punishment without trial by his peers, would you in these instances say he should be subject to a fine? No, sir. Let such a judge be disgraced—let him be turned from public employment. Let not the purity of justice be sullied by having on your bench men, who, dead to the feelings of patriotism, and unmindful of their Constitutional oath, must be compelled by fines and penalties to discharge their duty. The power of enforcing this writ as it stands under the Constitution and laws of the United States is complete. It is enforced in the same manner with all other processes issuing from the courts of the United States. The judge must in the first instance send the marshal. If the writ is disobeyed, he takes the posse comitatus. If this is not sufficient, the judge certifies to the Executive that the laws cannot be carried into effect, and the arm of the nation must be extended to support the judiciary. This is no theory—it has already been acted upon in this country. On the certificate of a judge that the laws could not be enforced, the militia were marched to the western parts of Pennsylvania. If your judges have no power to enforce the writ of habeas corpus, I should be glad to know how they enforce any other. It was not because the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is not sufficiently secured. It was not because the judges refused to issue it or wanted power to enforce it that this violation of right has occurred, but because the persons who might have claimed this privilege were snatched, under peculiar circumstances, from their jurisdiction. As the gentleman from Delaware has thought proper, on a motion to commit, to enter into a discussion of the merits of this proposition, I have made these observations. I have no objection to refer the resolution to a committee for the purpose of a full and fair discussion. I have no hesitation, however, in declaring that it is only to allow an opportunity for discussion, that I shall vote for the reference. I do not believe that any additional provisions are necessary to secure to the people of this country the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus; on the contrary, I do firmly believe that this right, like all others secured by the Constitution, can never be lost, or violated with impunity, until corruption shall have destroyed the principles of our Government.

Mr. Bidwell observed that on a motion to refer this resolution to a Committee of the Whole, he thought it unnecessary to discuss the merits of the subject at large; since the very object of the commitment was to afford a full and fair opportunity for such a discussion, and for any specific proposition, which the mover might think proper to submit. He was in favor of the proposed commitment, but on very different grounds from some of those which had been urged. Whether the conduct of the commander of the Army in arresting certain persons who attempted to corrupt him and to seduce the Army, to join in a conspiracy against their country, was to be condemned or not, was a question not suitable to be acted on at the present time, and under existing circumstances. If the House were the proper tribunal to decide that point, this was not the proper mode of deciding it, nor the proper time for the decision. No one would deny that the commander of an army or of a post might be so circumstanced, that it would be his duty to make a seizure of suspected persons, or perhaps do other acts not provided for by any law. In such a case he must act under a high responsibility, and throw himself upon the justice of his country. On this ground General Wilkinson had professed to act. If his professions should be justified by the real state of facts, he would be entitled to a favorable consideration. But at present it was unseasonable for the Legislature to express any opinion or take any measure. He regretted, therefore, that the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Broom) had resorted to this transaction in support of his motion. On general principles, Mr. B. added, he was willing to go into a Committee of the Whole on the subject. The importance of the privilege of habeas corpus was acknowledged by all. The Constitution, by restricting the Legislature from suspending it, except when in cases of invasion or rebellion, the public safety may require a suspension, had recognised it as a writ of right, and our statutes had authorized certain courts and magistrates to grant it. It had been, indeed, in some respects doubtful where the authority to issue such writs was lodged. Whether, for instance, the Supreme Court, a circuit court, or the justices of the Supreme Court, out of their appropriate circuits, had that authority, were questions, on which not only professional men, but judges themselves, had differed in opinion. Some improvements, perhaps, might be suggested. Although he lamented that the gentleman from Delaware had moved the subject at the present time, while some of the questions involved in it were under the consideration of the judiciary, and that he had referred, in his argument, to the late transactions at New Orleans, of which we have not sufficient information to form a satisfactory judgment, yet, he would consent to refer the resolution to a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of considering such propositions as that gentleman might offer for the amendment of the law.

Mr. Early.—Mr. Speaker, I feel very much at a loss to discover the correctness of the conclusions drawn by the two gentlemen from Virginia, (Mr. Eppes and Mr. Burwell,) from the reasoning which they have used. My views of this subject are in part the same with theirs; but those views will lead me to give a vote directly the reverse of that which they intend.

The motion to refer the resolution under consideration is objectionable with me, because of the time at which it is made. The resolution itself was laid upon the table upwards of a week ago—indeed ten days ago. And now when there is left but a very short space of the season, and the House is extremely pressed with other business highly necessary to be done, the resolution is called up, and a motion made to refer it to the Committee of the Whole.

No gentleman can believe that the subject can be matured and a law passed this session Indeed, sir, it does not appear that the honorable mover himself intended that anything definitive should be done. On the contrary, from the course he has thought proper to pursue, it would appear everyhow probable that even his own wishes were otherwise. It would appear, sir, that he had intended from the beginning to use the occasion as an instrument by which an impression should be made upon the public mind unfavorable to some recent transactions at New Orleans. Indeed the gentleman has come out and openly given to the subject that direction. And this circumstance forms with me another objection to the motion for a reference. Hang up the subject until the next session, and what must be the conclusion in the public mind? The answer is irresistible—that this House entertain the idea that the privilege of habeas corpus has been unnecessarily infracted. What follows? That the recent transactions at New Orleans were not demanded by an imperious necessity, and of course ought to receive the indignant frowns of the nation. The agent in those transactions, too, must in the mean time be consigned over to public odium. Now, sir, I take this occasion to declare my most decided hostility to such a a procedure. I will never consent to a measure calculated to give an unfriendly direction to the public mind, when we ourselves are without that information necessary to give a direction to our own. I will never consent to deliver up a highly responsible public functionary to the torture, before that functionary can have an opportunity to be heard in his own justification. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it depends upon events yet to be developed, whether the commander of the American Army has deserved execration, or merited applause. It may turn out that his conduct is without excuse, and it may turn out that it has been highly meritorious. He may have acted a part, for which he should suffer condign punishment, and he may have acted a part for which his memory would be entitled to a statue of gold.

There is, with me, another objection to the reference. The motion, timed as it is, and accompanied by the speech we have this day heard from the honorable mover, has a suspicious aspect and influence upon certain judicial procedures, depending at the present moment within the walls of this building. Is this House willing to suffer such manœuvres to take their proposed course, and to produce their wished-for effect? Are they prepared to interpose the weight of their influence to ward off the infliction of punishment upon traitors, by passing sentence of condemnation on acts which have produced their arrest and confinement? But it is not now alone that this pernicious tendency of the resolution is to be felt. Actions for damages are no doubt to be brought against the Commander-in-chief. Whether the damages which may be recovered, ought or ought not to be made good to him by the Government, must depend upon circumstances yet to be developed. That he has violated both law and Constitution, is not denied. But whether there existed that imperious necessity for such violation, which alone can justify it, and give him a claim upon the Government for the damages to which he may be subjected in consequence thereof, can only be determined upon a full view of all circumstances. Here presents itself another strong objection to the resolution. Its tendency is to procure now that expression of opinion by the National Legislature, in relation to the events at New Orleans, which will, which must, raise a powerful obstacle hereafter, against a remuneration of any damages that may be recovered against the Commander-in chief. To this I will not consent—against it I hold up my hands, and enter my most solemn protest. There is still a farther objection; the tendency of the resolution, if adopted by the House, will be to influence the amount of damages which may be assessed. Yes, sir, it will be viewed as the expression of an opinion on the part of Congress as to the demerits of the act for which damages are claimed. The effect upon the minds of a jury is even more to be dreaded than that upon the opinion of the judges. Who is there that cannot perceive its force? Who that must not deprecate its effect! If it should be observed that the resolution itself cannot be open to all the objections now urged against it, let it be recollected that the honorable mover has taken special care to give to it a direction, and accompany it by circumstances which must insure to it the operation complained of. In ordinary cases there can most certainly be no objection against an inquiry after defects in any branch of law, with a view to the application of some remedy. But such is not, as I apprehend, the state of the present question. Admit, for argument's sake, that a defect does exist in the present provisions for securing the habeas corpus privilege, can an adequate remedy be now applied? It cannot, we know it cannot.

But, Mr. Speaker, where is the proof that the provisions now in force are not sufficient for the security of the person? Have you any evidence to this effect? If you have, I am ignorant of it. Are not the courts of justice open? Let the persons injured resort thither. Let their complaints be laid before an American jury. Will not an adequate redress be had there? Are the people of the United States too insensible of the value of the privilege of the habeas corpus to award damages proportionate to the injury sustained by its infraction? Or is it that gentlemen suspect, that the individuals who have been arrested were engaged in a plot so diabolical that a jury would, upon a view of the whole ground, assess damages too inconsiderable to comport with their wishes? Is it for this reason that the American Congress are asked to prejudge the case, and to throw their weight into the scale against an officer who, from everything that yet appears, has acted from motives of the purest patriotism? The part he had to perform was one of the most arduous ever assigned to the lot of man. Entrusted with the defence of an important and extremely remote point, where all was to be done before instructions could be received from his Government, every measure was to be taken by his own judgment and upon his own responsibility. His chance of information as to the extent of the danger was extremely limited, and, so far as facts have come to light, he had powerful reasons for believing that the conspiracy was deeply laid—that it had diffused itself extensively in the very bosom of the country against which it was directed, and that it would be supported by a military force far more numerous than any he had at command.

Under such circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I repeat my decided hostility both to the resolution and the motion for its reference. And I again repeat, let the parties complaining to have been injured, resort to the proper sources for redress; let them go to the courts of justice. Here are the Constitutional organs for determining how far the existing legal and Constitutional provisions can administer redress. When these are, in the Constitutional mode, found deficient, it will then be time sufficient to apply the proper remedy.

Mr. Broom.—Mr. Speaker, I confess that the opposition which this resolution has met with does surprise and astonish me, and more especially when I consider the quarter from which it comes. That those who have been the most clamorous about the rights of the people, who have been jealous in the extreme of even the lawful exercise of power, who have assumed to themselves almost the exclusive privilege of protecting our rights, should now refuse even an inquiry whether those rights cannot be better protected, is to me a problem which I cannot solve, unless I suppose that these were principles and professions intended only for opposition, but never as the guide of administration. But when the principle is avowed that no laws shall be enacted for better securing our personal rights, and that no inquiry even on the subject shall be made at this time lest it might cast a censure on the conduct of an officer who violated them, I consider it my duty to protest against it. Sir, is it come to this, that when the Commander-in-chief of the Army of the United States shall turn his arms against our Constitutional rights, that we shall not provide against future violations for fear of exciting a prejudice in the public mind against the officer? Prostrate indeed must be our condition when we can see our great rights of personal liberty trampled upon by a military commander, and be deterred from legislating lest the punishment of future violations should be construed into the murmur of disapprobation of the past! For my own part, I deprecate such a state of things, and, in spite of party, trust that the highest legislative body of a free people will not be found so unfaithful to themselves and their country as to give it their sanction. But why, it is asked, am I thus zealous for the rights of the citizens? I arraign not the motives of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Eppes) for opposing this resolution; and, without a word in explanation of my own, I would be willing that the public should judge between us of our motives by our conduct. But, sir, it gives me pride and pleasure to avow my motives. I have beheld with indignation and horror, citizens of the United States illegally arrested, denied their Constitutional privileges, and transported, at the will of a military commander, nearly two thousand miles, before they were delivered up to the custody of the law. Instead of seeing such conduct marked with abhorrence I found the guardians of the people's rights singing praises to the sacrifices of the patriot and the honor of the soldier. I beheld these victims of power delivered over in solemn pomp to the ministers of justice, that they might crown with law the acts of tyranny and oppression. When I found these violations repeated and even aggravated; when I beheld a citizen of the United States arrested at the point of the bayonet, without any warrant whatever; imprisoned for weeks in his own country; cut off from all intercourse with family and friends, denied access to courts, and privilege of counsel, and deported under military escort from New Orleans to Washington, without any accusation, I considered it high time for Congress to put a stop to an evil which affected the rights of the whole community, and seemed to acknowledge no limits. I did hope that all would be sensible of these outrages, and with hearty zeal provide by efficient laws for the prevention of them in future. I did expect that the violations of the Constitutional rights of any citizen, however mean and abject his situation, would, as it was a common interest, be made a common cause. With such views of this case, I could not reconcile it to myself to be a silent spectator. It is asked why so much sensibility for men who are charged with treason against Government? I answer, that it is no matter how infamous the crime or how hardened the villain;—whenever the rights of personal liberty are attacked in the person of such offenders, it is a side blow aimed at the whole community, which they will and ought to feel most sensibly; and whenever the prejudices against a crime are made the pretext for the illegal oppression of the person charged, the attack is too dangerous to be trifled with; and I consider that he who can without concern look upon such violations of the rights of others, and indifferently folding his arms, console himself that it is not his own case, is not worthy of the character of an American, or the privileges which he enjoys. If these men are guilty of treason, their crime is of the blackest kind; depraved indeed must be that heart which can conceive treason against the United States. I have no charity for the crime, and with all my heart would punish it. But I cannot consent to break through laws and constitution to punish the traitor, much less one who is only suspected of treason? Now let me ask gentlemen, in my turn, why they feel so much sensibility about Gen. Wilkinson, and so little about the rights of the citizen? Are they afraid that the Administration will be implicated with the General, or are they indignant at even the suspicion that the powers that be can do wrong? For myself, though I am willing to repose all just confidence in the officers of our Government, I am not so blinded by my devotion as to be willing to fall down in the dust and kiss the foot that tramples on me. I am not prepared to surrender my rights at the footstool of ministerial or military power; neither am I willing to cry peace! peace! when I see the rights of others invaded.

The gentleman from Virginia has thought proper to congratulate me on my conversion to democracy, and to express his pleasure that my eyes have been opened. The gentleman would have done well to consider before this compliment, in what situation it placed him; for if I am advocating the principles of democracy, he is opposing them; and, if my eyes are open, his must be shut. I wish it to be understood that I am not advocating the speculative abstract rights of man, but good old Constitutional rights, such as have secured the civil liberty of England, from time immemorial, and such as will secure our own so long as we please to preserve them inviolate; and I shall not be deterred from my course, even by the charge of democracy—I mean here no disrespect to democracy, such as it ought to be understood, but only to that canting kind which promises much, and performs but little. In a country boasting less of democracy than our own, such conduct as we have witnessed, would have produced the most dangerous convulsions. Suppose that, in England, without any suspension of the habeas corpus, His Majesty's Secretary of State, upon his own warrant, had caused any British subject to be seized and dragged to the Tower, and there denied all intercourse with friends or counsel, and denied the privilege of habeas corpus; judging from the temper heretofore manifested, it would not be difficult to pronounce the consequence. The enraged passions of the multitude could be appeased with nothing but the restoration of rights thus unwarrantably suspended. It is alleged, as if in justification of General Wilkinson's conduct, that, twelve years ago, a member now of this House, from Pennsylvania, was arrested upon the charge of being concerned in the Western insurrection, and for three months denied the writ of habeas corpus. Without determining the degree of censure which ought to attach anywhere, I must remark that, if, in truth, he could not obtain the writ, his case affords a strong proof that the laws are defective, and ought to be remedied. Whether the motives of General Wilkinson be good or bad, it is not now necessary to inquire. I am not moving an inquiry into past events, in order to punish those who have been guilty of violating our laws. I am merely asking that we should inquire, whether laws ought to be enacted more effectually to punish or prevent them in future; and I urge it as the strongest reason for such an inquiry, that existing laws have been found, by experience, insufficient to prevent such abuses; and I contend that the punishment already provided, is by no means adequate to violations so gross, as those we have lately witnessed. But gentlemen contend that we do not know whether our privileges have been abused, until we hear General Wilkinson's justification. Sir, we are not indebted for our knowledge to whisper or rumor. There is no longer any room to doubt whether our Constitutional rights have been violated. We have received official information of the facts, and that information is recorded on our Journals. The Message of the President, of the 22d of January, informs us that two persons have been seized at New Orleans by General Wilkinson, and embarked for ports in the Atlantic States, and promises that, upon their arrival, they shall be delivered over to the custody of the law. General Wilkinson states that Mr. Bollman, one of the persons so seized, was required by the superior court, but that he got rid of that affair under the usual liability for damages. Another message informs us of their arrival here, and that measures are taken to hold them in custody. These facts warrant me in saying that, in defiance of the Constitution of the United States, persons have been seized by military authority; that they were demanded by the civil authority; that the military refused to deliver them up; and that they were transported under military guard, and by military authority alone, to this city, and that here the first steps were taken to put them into the custody of the law. Is it possible that we can shut our eyes upon these transactions, or reconcile it to ourselves to become the mere passive spectators of this violent usurpation of power? What excuse can any man render to his country for his supineness, in case of the commission of future violations? Can he plead his ignorance of what is officially communicated to him? Or can he say he was not warned of the dangerous consequences of these measures, or of the insufficiency of the laws to prevent them? The whole country know the fact and deprecate the consequences, and they know also that we have received official information of them, and they look to us, as their Representatives, to use every means in our power to prevent the recurrence of them. Can any man be willing that his right to personal liberty shall depend on the will of an executive or military officer? If he can, he does not deserve to possess the right, and is well represented by those who refuse to protect it. But let me caution gentlemen that this is not the temper of the majority of the nation, and that they have not so far sunk into apathy, or forgotten their rights of personal liberty, as to support the power that openly violates them. Let gentlemen beware how far they rely on the confidence heretofore placed in them. Upon questions of policy in the administration of Government, the people, reposing confidence in those who govern, may not give themselves much trouble to think whether they are right or wrong; but when great Constitutional rights are invaded, opposition arises, not from matter of opinion only, but a national feeling inspired by a common sense of danger; and if such invasion is made by those in whom too much confidence has been placed, that opposition will be heightened by resentment and indignation. I wish gentlemen to be sensible of their great responsibility. If these measures had been pursued during the recess, with what anxious eyes would the nation have looked forward to the meeting of Congress. The Executive standing alone would, as they ought, have borne all the responsibility; but when all branches of Government are in the full exercise of their functions, and no inquiry is made, or notice taken of it, the people can hardly believe in the extent of this usurpation of power; because, to believe it, they must impeach the fidelity of their Representatives. The Constitutional check of one branch upon another, was intended to prevent the unlawful exercise of power by either; but if Representatives can content themselves with officially viewing the prostration of the Constitutional rights of the citizen at the nod of a military commander, and can see with indifference the highest Executive authority availing themselves of such means to procure what they term the end of justice, these intended checks not only cease to be salutary, but become dangerous, by affording only a false security. In speaking of probable cause of arrest, I confined my observations to the case of Mr. Alexander. I have seen no message informing us of the particulars of this case, but it is said that this gentleman, in his professional character, moved the court at New Orleans for a writ of habeas corpus, for one of the persons arrested by military orders; upon the refusal of the General to obey the writ, he either moved, or was about to move the court for an attachment against him, and was soon after arrested by order of the General, and transported to Fort McHenry, at Baltimore; from thence, he was brought to this city, and taken before a judge of the Territory of Columbia, where he was informed that there was no charge against him sufficient to warrant his arrest, and he was accordingly discharged.

I now put it to the candor of gentlemen to say whether in this case there was any probable cause of arrest, or whether the same outrage might not be practised upon any other citizen of the United States upon the same principle, by the commander of any fort or garrison; and I will ask, also, whether the General might not as well have sent him to California, or Nootka Sound? For he was not charged with any offence upon which he was liable to arrest. If we have Constitutional privileges, we must be always ready to protect them; and if the privileges now violated, are not worth protecting, where are we to make the stand? When we see a cancer even in the extremities of the body politic, we must apply the knife, or the caustic, or it will reach the vitals. There ought to be no temporising; for it will become the more inveterate and confirmed, the longer we delay. Without the most prompt attention to the preservation of our privileges, we may have the form, but we shall not long have the substance of a free Government; and of all Governments, I think that the worst, where the sound of liberty supplies the place of the reality, and a thousand petty tyrants take shelter under the cloak of republicanism. This resolution is opposed by a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BIDWELL) on two grounds. First, that we must necessarily decide on the innocence or guilt of General Wilkinson. Second, that the laws are already sufficient. With respect to the first, I have already contended that the laws, providing only for future cases, will have no retroactive effect. I would be sorry to try General Wilkinson, or any other person, without suffering him to be heard; but we know from his own letters that the laws have been violated, we know that these violations seriously affect the dearest rights of the citizen, and we cannot deny that such violations ought to be guarded against by efficient laws. These facts then are sufficient to justify an inquiry, whether such efficient laws do exist; and as they are facts which no one will deny, it cannot injure General Wilkinson, or any other person, if we make laws to guard against the recurrence of them in future. It is said these men could not be tried at New Orleans; it is not material to involve in our discussion this question; for if they could not be tried they might have been imprisoned there, until they were transferred according to law to the place where a trial could be had; but it can never be justifiable in a military officer to seize and deport to any part of the United States, any citizen whom he might suspect of guilt. If it were admitted, an officer might carry a man from place to place until he found judges and juries disposed to convict—the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. General Wilkinson's zeal may have been sincere and his motives pure, and the pressure of circumstances such as to make him feel justifiable in his conduct; but, sir, we never can with safety entrust such unlimited discretion to any military officer; and such conduct, however innocent the motives, ought to be guarded against by the most severe laws. The second objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts is, that the laws are already sufficient. They surely have not been effectual to prevent the abuse of the privileges of habeas corpus. The writ was issued at New Orleans, and General Wilkinson in open court took upon himself the responsibility of refusing to obey it. The writ was issued at Charleston, and the officer refused to obey it, and the military continued in possession of their prisoner until they arrived at the place of their destination. The people of England never considered the writ of habeas corpus perfectly secure until it was strengthened by the statute of Charles. It seems generally agreed that provisions similar to that statute would be useful; but some gentlemen say that it extends to the United States, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) admits that if it does not extend, similar provisions ought to be made. Statutes declaratory of the common law are sometimes received in our courts; but I believe that it never was considered that penal statutes could extend without express Legislative provision. In Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New York, and perhaps other States, laws have been made to supply the provisions of the statute of Charles, and upon the principle that the statute did not extend. If these provisions are useful and there could be a doubt about the statute, the laws of the United States ought to provide; although the Constitution secures the privilege, and the laws authorize the judges to grant the writ, yet without penalties, the privilege is too liable to be abused. If an officer refuses obedience to the writ of habeas corpus, what remedy has the injured party? He must sue for false imprisonment, and if any prejudice exists against him, or in favor of the officer, he will only recover nominal damages. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. EPPES) avows, that, if he was on the jury, he would give no damages, if he was convinced the officer acted with honest intentions; and we can well conceive such prejudice to exist against a man charged with a heinous offence, as would prevent him from recovering real damages; for the abhorrence of the crime is often transferred to the party accused.

When illegal conduct is committed under color of authority, the whole community is affected, and an atonement ought to be made to society as well as to the individual.

The remedy for false imprisonment should still exist; but the officer should be subject to a penalty not to be assessed at the discretion of the jury, but to be fixed by law. The officer should also, having abused his power, be forever disqualified from holding any place of profit, honor, or trust, under the United States. By this no man would be deprived of a trial by jury, because the penalty and disqualification should only attach upon being found guilty by a verdict of a jury. It is objected by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr EARLY) that this resolution was not brought forward in due time. To this I answer that the events that have given rise to it are of recent origin. The gentleman also objects that we should be obliged to call on the President for information. If he is afraid of such information, it surely furnishes some reason to suspect that there is something rotten. I do not charge the Executive with the conduct of General Wilkinson; the share of responsibility which may belong to that quarter depends on circumstances with which we are probably unacquainted and the course which they may hereafter pursue.

Mr. JACKSON had hoped that the gentleman from Delaware would have contented himself with professing his regard for the rights of the citizen, and not troubled the House with the long speech which he had delivered on the occasion. Mr. J. said it gave him alarm to find such sympathy for men guilty of the most atrocious crimes. Treason in some countries may be an act of magnanimity, but here it is the worst of all crimes, because it aims at the destruction of the best Government and the happiest state of society in the world.

Mr. J. deprecated legislating from the impulse of the moment. It had proved the bane of that party under whose banners the gentleman from Delaware marshalled himself. If a man ventured to expose the conduct of the then existing Administration, he was to be gagged with the sedition law; if he failed in showing the due respect to the ruling powers, he was to be transported by the alien act.

Mr. J. conceived that the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus were amply secured by the Constitution, an authority paramount to any act of the Legislature. It was in his opinion so guarded as even to endanger the acquittal of criminals.

Mr. J. proceeded to observe that if any officer will violate the Constitution and take the responsibility, it is in vain to make laws in order to prevent it. But were there no circumstances to justify Wilkinson? He saw treason lurking on every side. There are cases in which necessity affords a complete palliation. The President's Message does not confirm the declaration of the gentleman from Delaware, that there were no grounds for a charge against Alexander. [Mr. J. here read Wilkinson's affidavit] Does it not show that they are all linked together? Wilkinson believed, and no doubt justly, that these persons could not be safely imprisoned at New Orleans. When it appeared that the judges, at least one of them, was desirous not to oppose the treason, it would have been madness in the extreme to have left the traitors there, and especially when it was expected that Burr would soon arrive with a powerful force.

The relief for abuses of the writ of habeas corpus is in trial by jury. This is the best relief. But the violator is also liable to impeachment, and is amenable to the Government. The outrages spoken of have a remedy—the privilege of the writ is amply secured; if the Constitution has been broken, a law would also have been broken in the same circumstances. Mr. J. then concluded by announcing his determination to vote against the reference of the resolution.

Several members were rising to speak, when an adjournment was moved and carried—yeas 60.

Wednesday, February 18.

Mr. Parke, from the committee appointed, on the ninth instant, "to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations ought to be made in the laws fixing the salaries of the Secretaries and Judges of the Indiana, Louisiana, and Michigan Territories," presented, according to order, a bill allowing an additional compensation to the Secretaries and Judges of the Territories of Indiana, Louisiana, and Michigan; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. Early, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were instructed by a resolution of the House, of the twentieth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, how far owners of ships shall be answerable for the acts of the master and mariner," made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the further consideration of the resolution directing an inquiry "into the expediency of providing by law how far owners of ships shall be answerable for the acts of the master and mariner," be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. Holmes, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill authorizing the settlement of accounts between the United States and William Eaton; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

An engrossed resolution, in the form of a joint resolution of the two Houses, "to publish the report and chart of the survey of the coast of North Carolina," was read the third time and passed.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The House proceeded to consider their ninth amendment, disagreed to by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808."

Mr. D. R. Williams moved that the House insist on their amendment. The bill without the amendment would provide that no negroes shall be transported from one State to another to be sold or held in service.

The motion of Mr. D. R. Williams was lost—ayes 11.

Mr. Gregg moved that the House recede from their amendment.

Mr. J. Randolph spoke at some length against receding. If the bill passed without the amendment, the Southern people would set the law at defiance. He would begin the example. He would go with his own slaves, and be at the expense of asserting the rights of slaveholders. The next step would be to forbid the slaveholder himself going from one State to another. This bill, without the amendment, was worse than the exaction of ship money. The proprietor of sacred and chartered rights is prevented the Constitutional use of his property. Mr. R. called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Marion, J. Clay, Alston, and Early, spoke against receding.

Mr. Gregg withdrew his motion, and the House reconsidered their vote on insisting, and determined to insist on their amendment. A committee of conference, composed of five members, was ordered to be appointed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the conference desired by this House, on the subject-matter of the amendment depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808," and have appointed managers on their part.

WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS

The House resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. Broom, depending yesterday at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Elliot.—Mr. Speaker, I made several efforts, sir, during the discussion of yesterday, to become entitled to the privilege of addressing yourself and the House, upon the present question, in which I was unfortunately disappointed. Had I succeeded, my remarks would have been very concise, and I feel no disposition even now to render them tedious. I shall take occasion, however, at the outset, to declare that I experience none of that fastidious delicacy with which the minds of some gentlemen appear to be impressed, in relation to this motion. I have no ambition to be considered one of those "silky, ducking observants, who trim their duties nicely," on a question of this character, on a subject of this magnitude; nor do I discover that profound darkness which the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Early) has described. I grope in no gloom. All is light and luminous around me. The path is plain. The way is clear, and environed with no difficulties.

Gentlemen have generally been disposed, and I think with propriety, to consider the subject in two points of view. First, to examine the merits of the proposed resolution upon general principles, abstracted from all connexion with events that have occurred, either recent or distant. Secondly, to consider the propriety of exercising the supreme legislative power, to preclude the recurrence of events which have sacrificed for a time "the holy attributes of the Constitution," to borrow the language of the great violator of the Constitution himself, at the shrine of military power.

Upon the first point, gentlemen who have expressed their sentiments, have been unanimous, or nearly so, in declaring that legal provisions of the kind now contemplated ought to be made, at a proper time, if those now existing are insufficient and inoperative. Those who have told us that the British statutes upon the subject of the writ of habeas corpus are in force in the United States, or even that it is doubtful whether they are so or not, need not have told us that they are not professional men; it was a work of supererogation. No professional man could for a moment entertain the idea that the statutes of Great Britain are laws of the United States. The question may be considered as undetermined, whether the common law of England, or any part it, which has not been expressly recognised by our Constitution and statutes, is law in the United States, considered in their federal character; it is at least well known that upon that question, a unanimous opinion does not exist in the first judicial tribunal of our country. For one, I do not believe that the United States, as the United States, possess any code of common law. I know of no laws of the Union but the Constitution and statutes. That Constitution and those statutes have recognised, or rather referred to certain portions of the common law, and particularly to certain technical common law terms and rules, as rules of practice in the federal courts; and beyond those the courts have common law powers. At all events we have not adopted any of the British statutes, and particularly, and by mere implication too, statutes highly penal in their operation. The doctrine is too absurd to be countenanced, upon serious reflection, by any man of common discernment. The Constitution has declared that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of invasion or rebellion, the public safety shall require it." But neither the Constitution nor your laws have made it a positive duty of the courts to issue the writ in any particular case; still less have they secured the performance of that duty by any penal sanctions. Can it then be improper to provide means to coerce the courts and officers of the United States in this particular, and to leave to all the citizens, at all times and under all circumstances, such an invaluable Constitutional privilege? Very few will deny or doubt the propriety of the measure. But many will say that it is ill timed, and the question of time naturally introduces us to the second scene of discussion.

It is said that it is improper at the present period to agitate the question now under consideration. In my apprehension the objection is a very strange one. The Constitution has just been violated by the commander of your army; violated at the point of the bayonet, and in more than one or two of its most essential articles. In addition to the celebrated part of that instrument which prohibits the suspension of the habeas corpus, except by the supreme civil power, in crises of great national danger, several of those amendatory articles which peculiarly secure the rights of the citizen, and the adoption of which, on that account, were necessary to reconcile the majority of the people to the original Constitution itself, have been disregarded and derided by a military chieftain. I allude to the following articles, all of which have been violated in most of their essential provisions:

"Art. 4. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

"Art. 5. No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless upon a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

"Art. 6. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel in his defence."

It is obvious that most of the privileges intended to be secured by these articles to our citizens have recently been denied to some of them, at the point of the bayonet, and under circumstances of peculiar violence. It may, indeed, be said that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was not denied in the first instance; that it could not be said to be suspended until the injured persons were placed in a situation which entitled them to demand it from the judicial power of their country. It is true that, notwithstanding inter arma silent leges, although the laws were silent amid the thunder of arms, and although a thousand terrors hovered around those who dared to exercise their professional duties in support of the Constitutional rights of the citizen, a writ of habeas corpus was claimed and obtained; and I had supposed that the very singular return which is said to have been made to the writ was placed on our official files. On searching them, however, I do not discover it; but it has been published in all the newspapers, and a copy of it is now before me, which I will read:

"The undersigned, commanding the Army of the United States, takes on himself all responsibility for the arrest of Dr. Erick Bollman, on a charge of misprision of treason against the United States, and has adopted measures for his safe delivery to the Executive of the United States. It was after several consultations with the Governor and two of the judges of this Territory that the undersigned has hazarded this step for the national safety, menaced to its base by a lawless band of traitors, associated under Aaron Burr, whose accomplices are extended from New York to this city. No man can hold in higher reverence the civil institutions of his country than the undersigned, and it is to maintain and perpetuate the holy attributes of the Constitution against the uplifted hand of violence that he has interposed the force of arms in a moment of extreme peril, to seize upon Bollman, as he will upon all others, without regard to standing or station, against whom satisfactory proofs may arise of a participation in the lawless combination.

"JAMES WILKINSON.

"Headquarters Army of the U. S.,
"New Orleans."

Here is a return, not of obedience to the laws, and high reverence for civil institutions, but of disobedience and defiance. The Constitution is violated in order to preserve it inviolate! Prostrated in the dust by military power, for the purpose of maintaining and perpetuating its holy attributes. And what great national object was to be accomplished by such extraordinary measures? What necessity could exist of seizing one or two wandering conspirators, and transporting them fifteen hundred or two thousand miles from the Constitutional scene of inquisition and trial, to place them particularly under the eye of the National Government, when, if the opinion of the officer himself was correct, it would immediately become the duty of that Government to suffer them to go at large? In regard to one of them, the General was uncertain whether he had committed a major or a minor crime; and the other he explicitly pronounces, as we learn from our official documents, guilty of misprision of treason, at all events a bailable offence. He says, 'from the documents in my possession and the 'several communications, verbal as well as written, from the said Dr. Erick Bollman, on this subject, I feel no hesitation in declaring, under the 'solemn obligation of an oath, that he has committed misprision of treason against the United 'States." Surely it is desirable to provide against the recurrence of scenes of this description. Or shall it be admitted that the whim, the caprice, the passion, or the ambition of a martial chief, may supersede at will the most important checks and safeguards of the Constitution?

But on this occasion the tocsin of party is sounded, and around the banners of party we must rally, or subject ourselves to new denunciation. I am not the champion of democracy, of federalism, or of any man or set of men; but I am, what every member of this House is bound by his oath to be, the champion of the Constitution of my country—a Constitution unnecessarily assailed and rudely violated. While that proud edifice shall occupy its present situation, I will place myself before its walls, and face the foe, whether that foe shall be a Burr or any other military usurper; I will lean against its noble pillars, and, if it be destined to sink beneath the shock, perish amid the sublime ruin! On a question like the present, the minor interests of party should sleep. At any rate, it must be suspected that there is a snake in the grass—latet anguis in herba—a secret spirit of dissatisfaction with the administration of the National Government must be supposed to exist and to operate. Why so? Has the Government avowed its approbation of its military chief? For me, I acquit the Administration. The General has taken upon himself the responsibility attached to his conduct, and upon his shoulders let it rest. It is time, however, to be explicit upon this subject. I concede to the Administration integrity and general ability, but do not agree to the ascription to it of that infallibility and perfection, the belief of which constitutes, at the present moment, the criterion of exclusive republicanism. In truth, I have heard so much of the virtue, the patriotism, and the perfect wisdom of the present Administration, that I am not anxious to hear much more upon the subject. As I surround myself with no equivocations, as I envelop myself with no disguises, I openly and frankly declare that I am becoming a little sceptical. It may be as dangerous to wander in the wilds of political as in those of religious scepticism, but I must take the course pointed out by duty, and risk the consequences.

We must at least be suspected of being envious of the fame or hostile to the character of General Wilkinson. To that officer I have once stood in the relation in which a soldier stands to his General: in that situation I was his friend, and even his partisan; and I have always considered him as possessing considerable military merit. I will admit, also, that in the present instance he has acted without corruption, and has only been more rash and arbritary in his conduct, than a man of more prudence and reflection would have been. But I think I have heard a hint that it may turn out he is entitled to a statue of gold. Let me forewarn gentlemen not to commit themselves in favor of such a proposition. Let them wait the course of events, and prepare themselves for disclosures, which, if I am not mistaken, will convince every one that such a measure would at least be extremely improper. Whatever rumors may have reached us this morning from the Western world, I should have held a very decided language upon this subject yesterday. If there is to be a golden statue in the case, I should prefer giving it to the gentleman from Delaware, who has drawn our attention to the present subject of discussion; as the agitator, however, of a subject, the agitation of which was extremely desirable, and, in my apprehension, indispensably necessary, he is undoubtedly sufficiently rewarded by the consciousness of having performed what he deemed his duty. Again and again I warn gentlemen to abandon the idea of a statue of gold. From the same quarter we are told that the salus populi may have required and may justify the lex suprema of military despotism. This doctrine is unknown to the Constitution. That sacred record of our rights proclaims itself and itself alone (and the people, when they adopted it, ratified the decree) the lex suprema, the "supreme law of the land." It acknowledges no superior. It contemplates no case in which the law of arms can erect a throne upon its ruins.

Again, we must be prepared for the insinuation that we countenance treason, and sympathize with traitors. It is surely wrong at this time to make our walls echo and re-echo, and the winds around us sing the charge of treason. Sub judice lisces. Let the courts decide. I have not seen "one jot or title" of evidence to prove the unfortunate persons now in confinement guilty of treason. Probably they may have been guilty of a misprision, or mere knowledge of a meditated treason; and at all events their conduct has been such as to require years of sincere repentance, to restore them to the confidence of society and their country. But upon general principles, without reference to any particular case, I hope that the resolution, which only contemplates the appointment of a committee, for the purpose of inquiry, will not, by any side-way operation, be defeated and destroyed.

Mr. Sloan.—Like the gentleman from Vermont, who has just sat down, I had a great desire yesterday to express a few words on the motion before the House, but I was not able to get a chance to address the House at the time. I must now beg leave to detain the House some time longer than would have been necessary then, in consequence of the lengthy speech we have heard from the gentleman from Vermont. That gentleman has said he will not only protect the Constitution, but, if it must die, he is willing to perish in its ruins. The gentleman I expect alluded to ancient times, as he often does in his learned way, when he made that figure, I expect, to the case of Samson, who, after the loss of his sight, also perished in the ruins of the destruction which he had made.

I beg leave to ask whether this gentleman's sight does not also begin to be dimmed as Samson's was? He says he begins to doubt the wisdom of our present Administration, and the wise measures they pursue. I expect the sight of that gentleman is not only dim, but I'm afraid he will be soon perfectly blind.

Some time ago, the gentleman from Vermont exhibited a scene of prolificancy which was never before paralleled in this House. He brought forth nine resolutions at once, and prefaced them by a long speech like that we have heard to day, in which he attempted to expose to this House the danger in which we stood with foreign Powers. Those resolutions brought up to my mind the recollection of a fable, which I once read when I was young. It was in a book which I beg leave to recommend to the gentleman from Vermont, if he has never read it. The book I mean is Esop's Fables. There is the story of a conversation between a fox and a lioness. The fox boasted of her great prolificancy, and reproached the lioness for bringing only one at a time. The lioness replied, that she indeed bore but one at a time, but that one was a lion.

After making these observations, Mr. S. begged leave to consider the merits of the question. I consider it, said he, as highly improper at this time. Whether it would be proper at any future time, I don't pretend to say. It is likely that prosecutions will be commenced against General Wilkinson. And will not this House show as much candor as the editors of newspapers, who say nothing on criminals left for trial, lest there should be a bias made on the public mind? No person can candidly say that Gen. Wilkinson ought not to have deprived these men of liberty to prevent their treason, and the destruction they meant against these United States.

Why such sympathy for these persons? In what circumstances were they taken? Were they taken from their homes and their fire-sides and denied the habeas corpus for some months, as has been in former cases, which compared to this, were only as a drop to the bucket? These men were taken in the act of treason or misprision of treason, against these United States. We ought to wait till we know more of the matter before we decide.

Is any member so lost to humanity in this House as to reprobate the conduct of the Executive or of General Wilkinson in this matter? The former insurrections compared to this were more properly oppositions to Government, oppositions to obnoxious and unjust laws, which have been since repealed, and are now justly consigned to eternal infamy.

The matter rests solely on two plain questions. The first is, was the confinement of these persons necessary? And second, was the civil authority adequate to their safe-keeping? It is plain their confinement was necessary; and as to the second question, it appears, from the affidavits of General Wilkinson, that Ogden, one of the conspirators, was released by the habeas corpus, after being confined.

If a force of 6,000 men had come against New-Orleans, as the General expected, and he had not arrested and sent these persons away, and they had been released by Burr, after capturing the city, these persons whom we see on this floor to have so much sympathy would be the first to charge General Wilkinson with neglect of duty. I have no doubt but this would be the case.

I consider the conduct of General Wilkinson not only justifiable, but highly commendable; and I am astonished that any should withold the tribute so justly due. I would say: Well done thou good and faithful servant, thou hast deserved well of thy country.

Mr. J. Randolph introduced his speech in favor of the resolution by observing, that he understood the question before the House to be, whether they would refer to a Committee of the Whole a motion proposing an inquiry whether further legal provision be not necessary to prevent violations of the writ of habeas corpus.

How long it had been the fashion to debate the merits of a subject on a simple motion to commit, it was not material to inquire. He believed it had commenced the present session.

Mr. R. supposed the object of the mover of the resolution in referring it to a Committee of the Whole was to obtain discussion. As that had already been had abundantly, and as the session would soon close, he suggested the propriety of varying the motion, and referring the resolution in the first instance to a select committee, who might immediately consider the subject and report a bill. Were the resolution to go to a Committee of the Whole, he feared it would never get through.

Mr. R. then observed that he would proceed to answer some objections which had been yesterday offered against the resolution, and state the reasons which induced him to support it, come from whence it may. The first objection which he heard was the quarter whence the resolution came. Permit me, said Mr. R., to remind the House that if those who have been called into public life on account of their professed attachment to correct principles, ever quit the ground of trial by jury, the liberty of the press, and the subordination of the military to the civil authority, they must expect that their enemies will perceive the desertion and avail themselves of the advantage. Can they who thus desert their old principles blame others for assuming the popular ground, which they have abandoned? Whoever stands forward in defence of the Constitution, and the rights of the people, shall have my support quo ad hoc.

An objection was taken by the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. (Early,) on the ground of time. It was said that this is an improper time to consider the subject contemplated by the resolution. Sir, this is no new discovery. The question of parliamentary reform has been thirty years agitated in England, and the right time has never arrived to consider the subject, and probably never will arrive. I also understood him to say——

[Here Mr. Early interrupted Mr. Randolph, and begged leave to explain. Mr. R. said he was confident that he understood the gentleman right. However, he at length sat down, and Mr. E. stated that his objection was that the House had not sufficient time this session to finish an investigation into the subject, and that therefore it had better not be atttempted.]

Mr. Randolph proceeded—I understood the gentleman perfectly before, and he would have found it so, if he had had patience to hear me out. He urged two objections on the ground of time: First that we had not sufficient time this session to consider the subject fully; and, secondly, that the present time was improper because the subject of habeas corpus was under consideration in the court below. [Mr. R. here either was or affected to be a little confused.] He was very sorry for the interruption. To prevent it in future, he would mention no gentleman by name, and he hoped he should not be again interrupted. A gentleman has said that the House have no official information before them relative to any violation of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. I will not refer to that gentleman by name, but the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Early,) will enable me to tell who is referred to.

We have now on our tables official information from the President of the United States, that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus has been denied and the Constitution violated. And will you attend to reports from your Committees of Claims, of Commerce and Manufactures, of Ways and Means, and leave the Constitution and the rights of the people to shift for themselves? There is abundant time. Congress can meet again after the fourth of March, and to postpone or delay a subject which affects the vitals of the State on account of a press of private or local business, would be a dereliction of our duty and of our oaths. Away then with such objections.

As to the objection that the subject of habeas corpus is now, sub judice, in the court below, no one thinks of a law which shall have a retroactive operation. I trust in God that no such ex post facto provision will be agreed to as was foisted into the bill which came from the Senate, to suspend the habeas corpus, and which was intended in a side way to cover with a mantle the most daring usurpation which ever did, will, or can happen, in this or any country. There was exactly as much right to shoot the persons in question as to do what has been done.

It has been contended that any measures on the part of this House will give a bias to the proceedings which have been instituted in the courts. Let me ask, what official notice we have of any such proceedings? But disdaining such a shelter, though it has been resorted to on the other side, it is sufficient to observe that a man has only to break the law or Constitution in the beginning of a session, and then forsooth you are to be foreclosed from legislating on the subject, because an instance has recently occurred to show the necessity of legislative provision.

Mr. R. said this was the first time in his life that he had heard it asserted that no law ought to be passed to punish any offence, because that offence had recently happened. He hoped he should never hear again such a reason delivered. The Romans, believing the crime impossible, had no law to punish parricide, till a case occurred, which proved their mistake. What would you think of Cato or Cicero rising in the Senate of Rome, and urging such a reason against a law for the punishment of this crime?

In the discussion of this simple motion to refer the resolution to a committee for inquiry, which I should have supposed would have been carried without any objection at all, hints of indemnity, I suppose to try the public pulse, have been thrown out. Permit me to say that bills of indemnity are not known to the Constitution. If the time ever arrives when the representatives of the people vote the public money to indemnify those who break the Constitution, we shall indeed become homines servile paratos, and fit for any Government and for any state of society, however despotic or barbarous. If ever the minions of the Executive, or the Legislature, whether civil or military, are indemnified for their outrages out of the public Treasury, the Constitution must have arrived at its last crisis.

After ridiculing the application which Mr. Sloan had made of the fable of the fox and the lioness, Mr. R. proceeded to observe that the doctrines advanced in regard to Wilkinson's conduct, merited the most pointed reprobation, whenever heard on the floor of the House. The Constitution, which is fixed, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, and which fate cannot change, if this detestable doctrine is admissible, is at once frittered away to nothing. It ought to run in this way: The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except, in cases of rebellion or actual invasion, the public safety shall require it, or, unless in the opinion of a military commander, it be necessary! What will be the difference, if you admit the doctrine, whether the Constitution be expressed in this way, or be left as it now stands?

It has been insinuated that certain gentlemen in this House lean too much towards standing armies, &c. Agreed. But in advocating an increase of the public force, my object was to chastise an insolent foe, not to employ it against our own citizens and to substitute it in lieu of the civil authority. My dread of standing armies has been more than a hundred times increased in consequence of the services to which our present little force has been put. From such armies good Lord deliver us!

I hope the committee to whom this subject may be referred will not forget to prevent a man from being embarked on board a shallop, and transported one thousand or two thousand miles for trial. For I have heard a law officer of the United States contend that a man may be arrested in one of the territories and a trial had in any part of the country, wheresoever he may be brought. If this abominable doctrine be supported by law, it is high time to correct it. The Constitution, in an article amendatory, declares that unusual punishments shall not be inflicted. Transportation, even after conviction, is an unusual, cruel, and severe punishment; but here it has been inflicted even before a conviction, and before any trial of the delinquents.

The court of Orleans has the same power as the district court of Kentucky, which is invested with the powers of a circuit court. If the district court of Kentucky has jurisdiction of treason, which no man ever doubted, it follows that the court of Orleans has the same authority.

When the Constitution gave to Congress exclusive jurisdiction over a district ten miles square, it filled the friends of liberty with alarm. But no man then dreamed that on this blot on the map, this nondescript region, a King's Bench was to be established for the trial of delinquents against the Government, collected from all parts of the country. The inhabitants of this miserable heath, men held in a state of bondage to which no man would submit, who have no voice in electing rulers of the country, are destitute of the right of self-government—these men are made the judges and jurors to try the freemen of America. Were I on trial, I would challenge the jury. They are not qualified for this office; they are not my peers. The people here must be the tools and expectants of ministerial favor. Let them move in their own humble sphere, but let them never dare to touch a charge of treason.

In the Declaration of Independence, transportation for trial is alleged as one of the grievances imposed by the British Government on the colonies. Now, it is done under the Constitution, and under a republican Administration, and men are transported without the color of law, nearly as far as across the Atlantic.

I make no profession of sympathy for the men who have been denounced as traitors. I argue on the supposition that they are traitors; there is no need of much exertion in behalf of good men. Attacks on the liberty of the people are, as has been stated before, made always in the persons of the vile and the worthless. But when precedent is once established in the case of bad men, who like pioneers go before to smooth the way, good men tremble for their safety.

Mr. R. observed that he would not say much of the Commander-in-chief. The least said, till they knew all, was the best. He had always thought that there were more rogues than one. This business of canonizing and sanctifying men before they are dead, he did not like. In the State of Virginia they had been compelled to change the names of several counties. There was a time in which the name of Arnold might have been preferred, and perhaps there may now be places in the United States which derive their names from Burr.

Mr. R. could not admit the jesuitical casuistry which had been displayed with regard to an oath. If a man breaks the Constitution, which they were all sworn to support, punish him. If the violator be Washington, Franklin, or Jefferson, Mr. R. would punish him, and he would also say, that no indemnity ought to be voted for him.

Mr. R. stated at some length the circumstances of the proclamation issued in England to prohibit the exportation of corn, when Chatham and Camden were in the Ministry, and who afterwards refused a bill of indemnity. Mr. R. observed that bills of indemnity were known to the English Constitution, and requisite in the case stated. But Chatham and Camden, though both the known and tried friends of liberty, here abandoned the popular ground, and rested their defence on arbitrary principles, while the wary Mansfield, an old tory and a high churchman, availed himself of the advantage, took up the cudgels for the people, and completely succeeded.

Mr. R. concluded by begging pardon for detaining the House so long, but he could never be indifferent on a subject like this. The House were now to decide if the Constitution were only pen, ink, and paper, and to be set aside at the whim of every military commander, or whether it were unalterable by fate, and if he who dared to violate it, should rue the consequences.

Mr. Broom, according to the suggestion of Mr. Randolph, varied the motion, and proposed to refer the resolution to a select committee.

[We have been thus far principally indebted to the report of the debate given in the United States Gazette, having been engaged in the Supreme Court.—Editor National Intelligencer.]

Mr. G. W. Campbell said, the first inquiry that naturally presents itself, in discussing this subject, is, what has occasioned the measure to be brought before the House at this time? This answer is given—the conduct of General Wilkinson, in arresting Bollman and others, at New Orleans, and transporting them to this place for trial, under military orders, in violation of the Constitution and laws of the Union. Suppose this to be the case, what remedy can the Legislature apply? Does the evil complained of arise from the want of laws to protect the liberty of the individuals and punish those who violate it, or from those laws not being duly obeyed? If the evil arises from a disobedience to existing laws, no act passed by this House can afford a remedy. Those entrusted with the execution of the laws may be stimulated to carry them into effect by this transaction, and to punish the aggressors, but it is no ground upon which this House can act, and no act that we could pass could, in any degree, affect the measures that have already taken place. The principal inquiry therefore appears to be, whether there is any law to punish the commission of such crimes as General Wilkinson is charged with? There can be no doubt on this subject; there are laws in every part of the Union to punish offences. If those persons were seized and carried away without legal authority, or a just cause that would excuse the act, it will be a false imprisonment, including in it an assault and battery—an offence punishable by law in every part of the United States. The offender may be indicted, and, on conviction, fined and imprisoned according to the nature of his offence. He may also be sued by the party injured, and damages recovered in proportion to the injury sustained. This is the remedy afforded by the law in such cases, and it has been considered sufficient to correct the evil. But it is said your Constitution has been violated, egregiously violated, by a disobedience to the writ of habeas corpus, or by depriving the party of its benefit; and this we are told by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Elliot) has violated the holy attributes of the Constitution; and he mentioned three several articles of that instrument that were violated at the point of the bayonet. This part of the subject, Mr. Speaker, may require some examination in order to be distinctly comprehended. Every public offence committed in this country, must be a violation of the Constitution, or of a law made in pursuance thereof, and may therefore be said to be a violation of the Constitution; and a violation of the Constitution is a violation of law, for the Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. But certainly it will not be contended, by any man acquainted with the state of our country and laws, that every such violation calls for the interference of the Legislature, or requires a new law to be passed. If a law is violated, the aggressor is punishable under such law. If the Constitution be violated—it being the supreme law of the land, the offender is punishable accordingly in the courts of justice, who are sworn to support such Constitution. Such violations therefore cannot necessarily require the interference of the Legislature, or the passage of a new law on the subject. If acts are done highly injurious to society, against which there are no laws, and the perpetrators would on that account escape punishment, it would then indeed be necessary for the Legislature to provide by law for the punishment of such offenders; but it has not been shown that such is the case in this instance.

It has not been pretended, that General Wilkinson, if he has acted in the unwarrantable manner stated on this floor, cannot be punished according to the nature of his offence; and it has already been stated that he is liable, if guilty, to be punished by indictment, and be made to answer in damages by civil suit. With regard to the violation of the Constitution said to have been committed by General Wilkinson, in not obeying the writ of habeas corpus issued by the judge at Orleans, I may be permitted to observe that this part of the subject does not appear to have been well examined by those who have spoken in favor of this measure. The words of the Constitution on this subject are, art. 1. sec. 9: "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." This provision evidently relates to Congress, and was intended to prevent that body from suspending, by law, the writ of habeas corpus, except in the cases stated, and has no relation whatever to the act of an individual in refusing to obey the writ—such refusal or disobedience would not certainly suspend the privilege of that writ, and must be considered in the same point of view as the violation of any other public law made to protect the liberty of the citizen. In the present case, however, if there was a refusal to obey this writ, it was a violation of an act of Congress, establishing that part of Louisiana where this transaction took place into a Territory, which expressly declares that the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, and it is punishable as such; but it cannot be considered a breach of the Constitution in any other respect than the violation of any public law made in pursuance of that Constitution would be, and of course cannot require legislative interference. With regard to the other three articles of the Constitution, to wit: the 4th, 5th, and 6th amendments thereto, said to have been violated by the conduct of Wilkinson, a very brief examination will show that there are provisions by law in every part of the Union to enforce obedience to those parts of the Constitution and punish those who violate them. The first of these articles merely declares the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, &c. against unreasonable searches, seizures, &c.; and that no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, &c. The first part of this only can relate to the present case, for it is not alleged that any warrant was issued; and every law existing in society for punishing offences against the persons and property of individuals, is calculated to enforce obedience to this provision. If a man is seized without legal authority or a just cause, cannot the offender be punished? He certainly can—and in what other way could you enforce obedience to this provision? The other two articles before mentioned can certainly have no bearing on the question before the House, they merely relate to the manner in which, and the place where offenders shall be tried—they are directory to the Legislature and to courts of justice; and it is not stated that either the one or the other have acted contrary to their provisions. No attempt to try these persons was made by General Wilkinson; he sent them to this place, they were delivered to the civil authority, and their case is now under legal adjudication. The courts of justice are the proper tribunals to decide, according to existing laws, where they are to be tried and in what manner. We are told, however, sir, it is necessary to make provision by law to enforce obedience to the writ of habeas corpus, and to punish those who may refuse to grant it. With regard to the latter case, there is not the least ground of complaint—the writ has not been refused in any instance when demanded. It was issued at New Orleans, and also at Charleston, and indeed it is not pretended the civil authority have on any occasion violated this writ. It has, on the contrary, yielded the most prompt obedience to it in every instance.

If it was made to appear to me that there were not provisions, by existing laws, to enforce obedience to the writ of habeas corpus, and to punish the violations of it, I would be among the first to make such provisions. But this has not been shown, and cannot, I presume, be proved to be the case. In every State, and in every Territory, as far as we are informed, there are laws to enforce obedience to this writ, and to regulate the mode in which it shall be obtained and prosecuted; and, by the thirty-fourth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, it is declared, that "the laws of the several States, except 'when the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the 'United States shall otherwise require or provide, 'shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at 'common law in the courts of the United States, 'in all cases where they apply." This provision must relate to criminal as well as to civil cases. You have, therefore, the same provisions at least, to enforce obedience to the writ of habeas corpus in the courts of the United States, that there are in the respective State courts; and it has not been shown that these provisions are defective in the State courts. Gentlemen have not pointed out an instance in which this writ can be violated with impunity. In every case that can be stated, the aggressor may be punished under existing laws; and that is the only mode in which you can enforce obedience to this writ, or to any law. You cannot prevent, absolutely, the commission of a crime; you can only punish the offender, and thereby discourage others from committing similar offences. You cannot prevent a man, while at liberty, from exercising his physical strength; and you can no more prevent him, by law, from violating the writ of habeas corpus, than you can prevent one man from striking another, or from seizing him, and carrying him away by force. All you can do, in either case, is to declare the punishment that shall be inflicted on such offenders. It has been stated by one gentleman, (Mr. Elliot,) as doubtful or unsettled, whether the common law of England is the common law of the United States, and as such, binding on the courts of the United States; and if it were not, it was insisted, we ought to make provision by law to supply its place, in regard to the measure before the House. On this subject, Mr. Speaker, I entertain no serious doubt. I am clearly of opinion that the United States, as a nation, have not adopted, nor are bound by the common law of England, and that, as a common law of the Union, it can have no force in their courts of justice. But, it is equally clear that the several States, or at least most of them, have adopted the common law of England, either in whole or in part, as the law of those States, respectively—under such restrictions as the change of Government in those States seemed to require—and being in this way incorporated into the laws of the individual States, and becoming a part of them, it becomes, under the act of Congress already mentioned, a rule of decision in the courts of the United States, in the extent to which it has been adopted in each State, respectively, wherein the courts may be holden, and under the restrictions contained in the said act. It is, therefore, in force in the courts of the United States, as being the law of the individual State in which they sit, and not as being the common law of the Union. They can derive no jurisdiction from the common law, any more than they can from the statute law of an individual State; and it may be laid down as clear law, that they can have jurisdiction in no case, except where it is expressly or necessarily given to them by the Constitution or statutes of the United States. But, when jurisdiction is so given to these courts, in a particular case, the laws of the State wherein the court sits will be the rule of decision in such case, as far as they apply. So, in the case before the House, the courts and judges of the United States are authorized by act of Congress to issue the writ of habeas corpus, and, having thus acquired jurisdiction, the laws of the respective States will be regarded as the rule of decision, and govern the proceedings on this subject, and they will be found sufficient to enforce obedience to the writ. Mr. C. was, therefore, opposed to the resolution before the House, and he considered an inquiry into the measure at this time unnecessary and useless, and calculated to waste the time of the House when there was important business that demanded their attention. I regret, said Mr. C., as much as any gentleman who has spoken before me, that party spirit has been introduced, and party feelings excited on this subject. But, at the same time, I confess I cannot observe the quarter from which this resolution comes, without entertaining some jealousy with regard to the objects gentlemen have in view. How long has it been since those gentlemen to my right, (the Federalists,) became the advocates for the rights of the people, and for Constitutional privileges—so sensibly alive to every encroachment on personal liberty and security? How long since they have ceased to consider it necessary to guard the people against themselves, as their greatest, their worst enemies? There was a time, Mr. Speaker, when, as has been stated, a sedition law passed with the full approbation of those gentlemen, or their predecessors in politics—when an alien law passed in like manner. The general sense of the nation declared those acts flagrant violations of the Constitution, and of the rights of the people; yet, no sensibility was then excited in the minds of those gentlemen, for the violated rights of the citizen, or the daring infractions of the Constitution. All those tender feelings are reserved for this precious moment. When the peace of the Union appears to be in some degree threatened by treason and conspiracy; when the traitors are apprehended and brought to justice; when the vigilance of the Government is likely to crush the treasonable conspiracy in its infancy, and restore peace and tranquility to the nation—then, this extraordinary sensibility is excited, and publicly expressed. And for whom, sir? For those who had conspired to stab the very vitals of your Constitution—to sever the Union, and to overturn your Government! Are these objects of more than ordinary compassion, that call for extraordinary exertions of the Legislature to preserve, untainted and unsullied, their precious persons and characters? I presume not, sir; and I apprehend the nation will frown indignantly on an attempt to palliate their crimes by endeavoring to excite the public sensibility in their favor. I am always unwilling, Mr. Speaker, to attribute the conduct of gentlemen to improper motives, when it can be otherwise accounted for. But, how can we account for the apparent change in the professions and declarations of gentlemen? those who imposed, and endeavored to continue on the people, burdensome internal taxes; who wished to raise and support navies and armies, in time of peace, to awe the citizens into submission; who passed sedition and alien laws to aid their general plan of strengthening the hands of Government, at the expense and destruction of individual rights? These very gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, appear now desirous of announcing aloud to the people, that they are the only advocates of their rights and liberties; that they are alive to the least violation of them; and that to them they ought to look for protection. But, sir, the people of America are too well informed to be deceived by such flimsy pretences. They will see, and duly appreciate the causes of this sensibility, so feelingly expressed, and the extraordinary exertions to alarm the public mind on this occasion. They will see, sir, that whatever the motives of gentlemen may be, the evident consequences of the proposed measure, if carried into effect, as contended for by its friends, would be, to make an impression on the public mind favorable to traitors and conspirators, who had combined to sap the very foundations of your Government, and to cast an odium on the conduct of those who exerted themselves to arrest their progress. I am unwilling, sir, to do this. I consider it our duty to let the laws operate on this subject, without receiving any bias from the decision of this House. From the manner in which this subject has been discussed, it would appear to an observer, that, at one time, we were trying General Wilkinson for the crimes with which he is charged, and that at another, we were examining the charges against the prisoners, whose case is now under legal adjudication before the Supreme Court. The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Elliot) has told us he has not discovered a tittle of evidence to show that the persons have committed treason, and that their crime, at most, can only be misprision of treason. Although we are given to understand that that gentleman is a professional character, I must beg leave to differ with him on this subject. If treason has been committed by the author of this conspiracy, those persons, if guilty of any crime, must be guilty of treason, and not of misprision of treason only. They aided and abetted in carrying into effect the project. They carried and delivered a letter, knowing its contents, from the principal conspirator to General Wilkinson, for the purpose of engaging him to join in this undertaking. They used their influence to corrupt him. These must be considered overt acts, giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the nation, and will make them principals in the treason, if such a crime has been committed; for, in this crime, there can be no accessories—all who are concerned are principals. Misprision of treason is a distinct and separate offence. It is merely the neglect, or omission to make known to the proper authority the treason that has come to the knowledge of the party. It supposes that no act has been done by the party charged; that he has given no aid or assistance whatever to the enemies of the country, but has merely acted wrong, mistaken his duty (which is the meaning of the term) in not discovering, in due time, the acts of treason that have come to his knowledge, and is, on that account, considered guilty of a high misdemeanor. It was not, however, my wish, or intention to give any opinion on the merits of this case. I am willing to leave it to the decision of the Constitutional tribunals. But, gentlemen seem as if they were determined to discuss the guilt or innocence both of General Wilkinson and the prisoners. This, I consider altogether improper, as it might give an undue bias to the public mind on this subject. For this reason also, sir, I am opposed to referring the resolution to a select committee. There is another reason, Mr. Speaker, that operates with me to oppose the present measure, and that is, that by passing general laws on such subjects as that before the House, you would encroach on the State authorities. Each State is competent, it is presumed, to pass laws for the protection of the rights and liberties of its citizens; for the regulation of its own internal and domestic concerns—and in this consists the independence of the respective States. The means of obtaining the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, and the mode of prosecuting the same, are evidently domestic regulations, essential to every free government, and constitute an important part of the laws of the several States—and the right to the privilege of this writ is secured to the citizen by the Constitution of every State in the Union. This will not be denied, nor will it be pretended that the States have not laws to enforce obedience to this writ. If, therefore, you pass a law on this subject, it will, if it has any effect, control the laws of the several States; and, in proportion as it has this effect, it weakens the respective State authorities, and tends to consolidate their powers in the General Government. I would warn gentlemen against adopting a measure that would have this effect. The State sovereignties ought to be preserved inviolate, and should not be encroached upon by this House legislating on subjects that properly belong to the State authorities. The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Elliot) has informed us that he is the champion of the Constitution. Mr. C. said he did not wish to assume to himself exclusively such a character. It was, however, to be hoped the Constitution would have many supporters, as zealous and as able as the gentleman from Vermont. He should be always willing to support the Constitution and laws of his country, as far as it was in his power, when the occasion required it, and he presumed every man in that House was bound, on oath, to preserve that instrument inviolate. He never would, however, sound the tocsin of alarm with regard to the violation of the Constitution upon every infraction of law that might take place. This could have no other effect than to disturb the public mind unnecessarily, and might, in the present instance, make an impression unfavorable to some of those concerned in the transaction which occasioned this discussion. There are other reasons, also, said Mr. C., that operate with me to oppose the measure before the House. The case is, at this moment, sub judice. This is, to my mind, a serious objection to acting on it here. We ought to permit the laws to take their due course, without expressing any opinion on the subject in this House. We shall probably find they are sufficient to afford a complete remedy in every case where real injury has been sustained. It is, also, now near the close of the session. There are many other important subjects before the House, that require to be acted upon, and it would be next to impossible that this subject, if gone into, could receive that deliberate investigation which its importance would demand. For these reasons, and because I consider the measure, at this time, unnecessary and useless, I shall vote against referring the resolution to a select committee.

Mr. Holland.—It is said by gentlemen, that, by the conduct of General Wilkinson in sending Bollman and others from Orleans to this city, there is a flagrant violation of the Constitution, and a crime committed that should be punished as a felony, and the purpose of making an offence of this kind a felony is the object of the present motion. That these persons may have been deprived of certain rights secured by the Constitution is a possible and probable case; for every illegal deprivation of right secured by law under the Constitution may be said with equal propriety to be a violation of the Constitution. But, sir, so far as respects the habeas corpus, the suspension of it applies to the Legislature, and not to persons. The Constitution says it shall not be suspended but in case of rebellion, or when the public safety requires it. This prohibition manifestly applies to the Legislature, and not to persons in their individual capacity. If, therefore, the Legislature suspend the habeas corpus when there is no rebellion, or when the public safety does not require it, they would be guilty of a violation of it. But how has General Wilkinson violated it? He has no power to issue or detain the writ. The issuing of the writ of habeas corpus is the duty of your judges, and they have in all cases issued the writ. It was issued in the present case at Orleans; and issued at this place in behalf of these men. Your judges have at all times in this particular been ready to do their duty. And if so, where is the necessity of coercing them, as proposed, by fines and penalties? Sir, the necessity does not exist. If General Wilkinson has disobeyed this mandatory writ, he stands in contempt, and your judicial courts have already power to punish contempts. If he has violated any law, he is liable to be punished. If he has deprived any persons of their rights secured by the Constitution or by the law, he has done it upon his own responsibility. The laws are ample and will give redress for every injury. Let these persons bring their actions, and if it should appear that they are innocent, and that the General has wantonly deprived them of their rights, an honest jury will give exemplary damages; but if on trial it should appear that they were guilty persons, and that the public safety required their being transmitted to this place, they will not, they ought not, recover a single cent.

But how does it happen that so high a sensibility is excited on the present occasion? Is there a single gentleman that doubts of the guilt of these persons? As to the amount of their guilt there may be some difference of opinion; but I will venture to say that no one believes they are innocent. I am apprized, however, that as the offence is of a political nature, a great difference may exist as to the criminality of their conduct. All will admit that they have conspired against this Government. But as a great diversity of opinion ever has and always will be entertained as to what kind of Government should be established for the good of the human race, according to the preference in the mind of each individual to any particular form of Government, the crime will be apportioned. Many well informed honest men have been in favor of a monarchy. Others of an aristocracy. Some for a democracy, or a republic founded upon democratical principles. It, therefore, follows that if there are any gentlemen in this House who think a monarchy the best, and that this Government is not worth preserving, that it is good for nothing, they cannot view an attempt to overturn it as a high offence. No, sir, they cannot; although as honest men, and men of honor, they could not partake in a conspiracy, yet as the means, however dishonorable, might produce a good end, that of establishing a Government better calculated for the general happiness of mankind, they would be ready to excuse. But, sir, all those who believe this the best of Governments, will consider an attempt to overturn it as the highest offence. It is said by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) that it is no odds to him from what quarter a proposition is made; that if it is just he will support it. It is so with me, sir; but if it comes from a quarter not in the habit of making propositions of that kind, I will take the liberty of examining whether it is solid, or only a plausible pretext to effect a different object. When I see so strong a desire, or seeming anxiety, exhibited for the protection and security of the rights of the citizen against the encroachment of governmental power, as in the present case, among gentlemen of a certain political description, my mind is led back to past periods, to times when the alien and sedition law were the order of the day. It was then that the Government itself, being administered by persons of this description, adopted a course well calculated to make it strong and energetic. But now, sir, the Administration being transferred into other hands, they have become the exclusive guardians of the rights of the citizen. Conduct of this kind may lead us to suspect that what they could not effect when clothed with power, may be now effected by artifice. Be this as it may, there has been no cause shown to justify the adoption of the resolution. The case referred to does not justify it. Bollman and Swartwout are not innocent men. Were it demonstrated that they were innocent, and had suffered without a possibility of redress, it might then be proper to adopt measures to prevent future aggressions. But as this has not been shown, and, so far as we know anything respecting them, they are culprits, whether they have committed treason or a lesser offence, they are guilty of crimes, they are conspirators, and it is unusual for Legislative bodies to legislate in favor of offenders.

It is strange that there is so great a difference of opinion on this occasion. The gentleman from Delaware thinks there was no danger, no rebellion, no crime, and no necessity of transmitting these persons from New Orleans to this city. General Wilkinson, who was on the spot, thought differently; and from the same evidence officially communicated, on which the gentleman has formed his opinion, the judicial authority of this territory formed a different opinion. On this evidence, the judges committed Bollman and Swartwout for treason; and on the same evidence the Senate suspended the writ of habeas corpus, by which they have announced to us and to the world that these persons and their confederates have forfeited their right to this writ. But the gentlemen who advocate this motion declare they have not forfeited it; but that it should be better secured to them by law. But, sir, I am for a different course. I wish not to touch the subject. We are not prepared to say whether the conduct of your commander has been proper, or what is the guilt of these men. They are now, where they ought to be, in the hands of the judicial authority. Under this impression, I was opposed to the suspension of the habeas corpus, and under the same impression, I shall be against the present resolution.

Mr. ALSTON said he did not rise to enter into the merits of the question, which had been yesterday under consideration; but merely to state the reasons which had induced him to change his vote on this occasion. He said he considered the question at present presented to the House, as more objectionable than that first submitted. What was the object avowed by gentlemen as the cause of this discussion? Was it to punish those who had violated the laws of the country? No. This was not the object. The object must then be to have an improper influence on the things that had already happened, and with regard to which the existing laws might be construed differently from what they would be, if the Legislature did not interpose. Why had gentlemen laid still for these fifteen years past, and omitted to make the discovery that there was no law in existence to punish any man who may disobey the writ of habeas corpus? Why have gentlemen on former occasions suffered individuals to lie in jail for weeks after that writ had been issued? If the laws at present in existence do not now operate, can anything which we can do make them operate on those now arrested, or on those who hereafter may be arrested? Gentlemen on this subject may know better than I do, for I believe this conspiracy has spread much wider than is known to this House, or than gentlemen are willing to acknowledge. I am authorized to express this opinion from the documents on our table.

This proposition is brought forward in a most imposing shape, and it is undoubtedly one to which no one would object, if brought forward at a proper time, if there were not questions depending on which it is calculated to operate, and if there existed the least probability of anything final being done upon it, before the close of the session. The inquiry is proposed to be made by a select committee; the mover of the resolution will of course, according to the mode of proceeding in the House, be chairman of that committee, and the report will in all probability be made at too late a period of the session, to admit of a full discussion, and an effect be produced by the report very different from that which would result from a full investigation of it. May not its effect be, to cover a decision which the gentleman knows is about to be made? To make it appear that those who make that decision have the voice of the people with them? The first course proposed, of submitting this proposition to a Committee of the Whole, had a tendency to produce an immediate investigation of the subject; an agreement to the present course will have the contrary effect, of delaying it. This proposition really presents a strange appearance. Gentlemen, heretofore the vehement advocates of energetic measures, are now converted into their opponents. This, however, is not strange to an accurate observer of human nature; opposition is opposition still, and let it come from what quarter it may, the general clamor is a regard to the liberty and rights of the citizen. But surely this of all species of protection is the strangest! The protection of men engaged in violating the rights, the liberties, and Constitution of their country! Any judge, says the gentleman, who shall dare to refuse to grant the writ of habeas corpus, or officer who shall refuse to obey it, shall be mulcted in heavy damages. What does this amount to? If any person shall even see treason committed before his face, or Aaron Burr marching at the head of the marine corps, he shall not dare to arrest them; but shall, in the first instance go before a judge, or render himself liable to be mulcted in heavy damages. Mr. ALSTON concluded by observing that the question had been amply discussed, and that he had only risen to give his reasons for considering the direction at present proposed to be given to the subject more improper than that at first suggested.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said it was far from his intention again to trouble the House on this subject; but the omission of some ideas which he meant before to have offered, and some doctrines which had been advocated by the opponents of the resolution, compelled him once more to address the House. Where are we? said Mr. R. Are we in the Congress of the United States? Is this the House of Representatives of this Union, and are we to hear on this floor the doctrine advocated that a flagrant violation of the Constitution is to be remedied by an action of damages as in a common assault and battery? Is it possible that such can be the idea of this House; such our respect for the Constitution, for the institutions we are all sworn to support, and which, if we do not support, whether our treason be committed under the banners of Aaron Burr, or under the cover of law, we are equally traitors! Is this House ready to sanction the doctrine that an open and avowed contempt of the civil by the military authority, shall be considered as nothing more than a common violation of law? A refusal to respect the writ of habeas corpus by a civil officer, is a high misdemeanor. Much more is it a misdemeanor, when committed by a military man, and more especially if committed by the commander-in-chief of an army. With regard to plots and plotters, conspiracies and conspirators, I am not their friend. If they exist, I would deal with them according to law, I would give them sheer law; they should have no more at my hands. Do gentlemen, however, pretend to say that you can proceed against a man otherwise than according to law? I stand here as the advocate of the law. Laying aside the question of guilt, I say proceed according to law. If you do not do this, you may first incarcerate a man, and afterwards summon a venire to try whether the act is justifiable. It is said dead men tell no tales. I will put a case. I will suppose Aaron Burr a conspirator against the United States; a traitor. Let him die. If so, I would hear the sentence pronounced with pleasure.

But suppose another thing—suppose a conspiracy has been going on for several years; suppose a person has been for several years concerned in it, and to cover himself from suspicion he outherods Herod, and because his weak nerves cannot endure the sight of a traitor stabs him. Is this to be justified? It is well known that a conspiracy to separate Kentucky from the Union is no new thing, and no zeal which any man concerned in it may now manifest can throw off suspicion from his shoulders. These are the plain facts.

I will put another case. If a man charged with a crime committed in a territory can be carried to a territory two thousand miles distant by a military guard and there tried, what is the situation, Mr. Speaker, in which you stand? You yourself may be arrested; for you are in a territory, and the little remnant of the army here may be charged to carry you to New Orleans. Your privilege will not extend to felony or to a breach of the peace.

I will put another case. A member of this House may be carried to the marine barracks. You may issue your writ, and your Sergeant-at-Arms make return that the member is carried to Orleans; and as accidents will happen, he may be knocked over by the boom, and there is an end of him. Will you sit down contented with such a doctrine, that the civil authority shall be put at defiance by the military, and the citizen shipped off to New Orleans, there to be tried by a dependant tribunal?

I avoid saying anything as to plots. I have no doubt, however, of this plot, and I have no doubt of the existence of a plot also in 1788, and down to the year 1795. But in what way has every free people become slaves? The common recipe is—take a quantum sufficit of plots and of military force, always kept ready for the purpose, and the end is accomplished; and I say this must, if you give sanction to such acts, be the death of your Government. Has any revolution taken place in the affairs of France, which was not preceded by a plot? Are we sure that time and chance, which happen to all men and all nations, may not happen to us?

One word on the subject of the quarter from which this motion comes.

An attempt is made to sound the tocsin, and to discipline the House under the banners of party, on a Constitutronal question. Where the violation of the Constitution is not pretended to be denied, it is expected that the House is to be rallied under the banners of party. The gentleman who brings forward this proposition is charged with the sentiments he entertained some years since; but it is the misfortune of this argument that it cuts two ways; if you resort to the sedition law, the alien law, and other acts of those days, you have no right to refuse gentlemen now the benefit of their principles. The people of this country, after two or three juggles of this kind, will be apt to conclude that federalism or republicanism depends on being in or out of the Government; that those who are in are good federalists, and those out republicans; they will find this out, if they do not suspect it already. A few such instances, and the scales will fall from their eyes. You quote the most detestable instances of a violation of a law which have taken place in time past—no, this is the most detestable of all—and yet you gravely tell the people that you will not listen to men who advocate rights thus infracted. The people of the United States will eventually listen to them, if you pursue this course; and it is because I do not wish them to listen to them, that I do not wish to see them foremost in such a cause as this. It is a disgrace to the old republican party, if indeed it is yet in existence, that the writ of habeas corpus should find its first defenders in that quarter. There is on this subject one melancholy fact, and that is—that in 1797 the federalists were in a majority; in 1807 the republicans are in a majority—has the generation of 1798 passed away? No; the same people that were in 1798 federalists are in 1807 republicans, and that is the clue to the thing; all those who swim with the tide come over to the stronger side.

We are told by some gentlemen, that they do not pretend to set themselves up as the exclusive champions of the Constitution or the laws. I am glad of it; for God help the Constitution and the laws, if they depended upon them.

In my mind it is high time to make a provision for a complete casus omissus of power delegated by the Constitution. You have found members this session voting to make a violation of a provision of the slave bill death, on the broad principle of natural right; and yet would you do less for a violation of the liberty of your citizens, when you are bound to protect them, not only by natural right but by conventional institutions and your oath? If a military man should take, I will not say a member of this House—but any one of the miserable citizens who inhabit this place—and escort him under military guard to New Orleans—I say the military man who would do such a thing ought to be precipitated from the top of the Capitol. I would teach the military that they are to be subordinate to the civil power, and that if they undertake to violate the civil institutions of their country, they should pay the penalty of their lives. If you do not guard the people from such an excess of military power the time will come when you will be kicked out of doors at the point of the bayonet. We have seen the Legislature of a nation as enlightened as ours, treated in this way. There is one institution on which I fear we have placed too great a reliance. I have been always attached to the press, and desired to see it free and unfettered; and I have gone uniformly with those who supported this opinion, even in the time of alien and sedition bills, and not merely in a period of sunshine. Experience has proved to us that the press in the hands of a tyrant may become one of the firmest supports of his authority; and if there shall be a collision between the press and the bayonet, it needs no prophetic spirit to say which will kick the beam.

Mr. M. Williams said, he would state one or two reasons why he should vote for committing the resolution. As he understood the subject, the only consideration at present was, whether it was necessary to make an inquiry into the expediency of amending the laws on this subject. It had been endeavored to make this a party question; he considered it of no importance from what quarter a proposition came. If he thought it right, he should vote for it. The gentleman from Tennessee has observed that the Constitution has made an ample provision on this subject. It appeared to him that the Constitution had only secured the writ of habeas corpus; no penalty had been attached to its violation, and hence the necessity of some legislative provision to answer this purpose. The same gentleman has observed, that there is no necessity for legislative provision, as the statute book is already crowded with cases; but, Mr. W. said, he believed there was no legislative provision for the violation of the writ under the authority of the United States. It had been also said, that a provision under the Government of the United States would abridge the rights of the States; but, Mr. W. said, he could not see how this remark applied. He did not wish for any abridgement of those rights. The States undoubtedly had a right to pass laws relative to the execution of the writ within their jurisdiction, and Congress had a concurrent power to regulate it under the jurisdiction of the United States. Mr. W. said, in his mind many arguments had been urged which were irrelevant; such as the conduct of the commandant at New Orleans, and of the persons brought before the court. It had been said, that this was an improper time to bring the case before the Legislature; but, gentlemen would find, that new cases had very frequently given rise to new laws; and the present case clearly showed the necessity of some new provisions. Whether the persons implicated on this conspiracy had committed treason or not, was not the inquiry; the only question was, whether any further legislative provision was necessary to secure the writ of habeas corpus. He would ask, whether in this instance the Constitution had not been violated by the interposition of the military authority? Whether the persons arrested were guilty or not, was not for the House to say. Mr. W. said, he did not think that the reference of this resolution would have any influence on the court; as an inquiry by the House would impose censure neither one way nor the other.

Mr. G. W. Campbell said he was sorry it was incumbent on him to say, that if the remarks which had fallen from him had been alluded to, he had been either egregiously misunderstood, or wilfully misrepresented. He had not introduced the measures of a former Administration as a cloak for this House; what he had said could not have made such an impression on the mind of any man; he had not said that the passage of the alien and sedition, laws at a former day, authorized the present Legislature to violate the Constitution. He had stated that circumstance as one of the reasons which induced him to be jealous of the quarter from which this measure emanated. He was still of the same opinion; he must be jealous of the gentlemen who, notwithstanding their lively patriotism at the present day, had thus slept on their oars for fifteen years past.

We have been told that plots are taken advantage of to destroy the liberties of free nations. This, however, was the old story, very tickling to be sure to the public ear; but a mere pretext a kind of declamation which had become a very fashionable substitute for argument. It had also been said, by the gentleman on his right, that he felt very happy that certain persons were not the champions of the Constitution or the laws. Mr. C. said, he had observed that he did not profess to be the exclusive champion of the Constitution and the laws; it was true that he did not wish to be thought such; but he trusted in God that the Constitution did not depend on the effervescence of an enthusiastic imagination, discharging without argument its ebullitions in such a style as was often heard in that House, or on gentlemen whose remarks on one day are in opposition to those delivered by them on another; and whose speeches delivered on different days answer themselves; he had before said, and said again, that he should be always ready to support the Constitution and laws of his country; but that under this pretext he should never come forward as the champion of the Constitution and laws merely to declaim and make a noise.

It had been said, that such an extraordinary case as the present required extraordinary interference; but he would ask where any deficiency of legislative provision had been shown to exist on this subject? Suppose a man entered this House and killed a member; he would be punished as in common cases. So in the present instance, if the military trampled on the civil power, the courts of justice were open for redress. But it is said we should punish this offence with death; this was an instance of the extravagance of which he had spoken. If every infraction of the Constitution and laws was made a capital offence, they would be carried back into that state of barbarity which existed three hundred years ago, when life was the uniform penalty attached to every offence. He had thought that the American nation had established a humane system of punishments, founded on the principles of philanthropy. If these principles are to be now abandoned, we may retrace our steps into the dark ages of barbarity, when sanguinary punishments were made use of to keep nations in submission to their tyrants. Mr. C. said, he should vote decidedly against referring this proposition to a select committee at this time; because he saw no good purpose that such a reference could answer; because he did not believe that any alteration in the laws was necessary, and if necessary the remainder of the session was insufficient to make it. The laws of the several States had made complete provision for securing the writ of habeas corpus in all instances, in which no defects had been pointed out that he had ever heard of.

Mr. Masters opposed the resolution. He could not conceive how a refusal to obey a writ could be considered a violation of the Constitution. Why, said he, this extraordinary zeal for those people's rights who want to destroy your own rights? Have no other people any rights?

Several gentlemen were rising to speak when an adjournment was called for, and carried.

Tuesday, February 19.

Mr. J. Clay, from the committee appointed on the sixteenth instant, presented a bill to explain the act, entitled "An act for fixing the rank and pay of the commanding officer of the Corps of Marines;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a supplementary report in relation to invalid pensioners, made in pursuance of the act of the tenth of April last, entitled "An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary War;" which were read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. J. Morrow, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was committed, on the seventh instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act confirming claims to land in the District of Vincennes," reported to the House their agreement to the same, without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. J. Clay, from the committee to whom was committed, on the sixteenth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act establishing a mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," made a report thereon; which was read, and, together with the bill, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from our Ministers Plenipotentiary at London, informing us that they have agreed with the British Commissioners to conclude a treaty on all the points which had formed the object of their negotiation, and on terms which they trusted we would approve. Also, a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary at Paris, covering one to him from the Minister of Marine of that Government, assuring him that the imperial decree lately passed was not to affect our commerce, which would still be governed by the rules of the treaty established between the two countries. Also, a letter from Cowles Mead, Secretary of the Mississippi Territory, acting as Governor, informing that Aaron Burr had surrendered himself to the civil authority of that Territory.

The said message was read, and, together with the documents transmitted therewith, ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the said motion do lie on the table.

WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS

The House proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. Broom—ayes 60, noes 37—the question being on its reference to a select committee.

Mr. Burwell said when he had before addressed the House on this resolution, he had observed that he would vote for its reference to a Committee of the whole House. He should now vote for its reference to a select committee. The change proposed in the mode of its disposition had not varied the principle. It had always been a maxim with him to favor inquiry when solicited in respectful terms. He held it to be the right of every member to submit any resolution to the House which he thought proper, and the duty of the House to give it a respectful attention. He rose, however, at this time for the purpose of offering an amendment to the resolution, predicated on the necessity of limiting the power of the Supreme Court to issue writs of habeas corpus. The object of this motion was not in the least to affect the decision of the Supreme Court, recently made on this subject; but the fact was, the judges themselves questioned their power, sitting as a court, to issue this writ. It was true that in two cases they had exercised this power; but in the last case, after a very full examination, if he was correctly informed, two judges had given an opinion that the court had the power, two were of opinion that they did not possess it, and a third had coincided with the two former judges, barely because a like decision had been heretofore made. In the act of 1789, Mr. B. said he found the following provision:

"All the before mentioned courts of the United States, shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law. And either of the justices of the Supreme Court, as well as judges of the district courts, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of commitment. Provided, That writs of habeas corpus shall in no case extend to prisoners in jail, unless where they are in custody, under or by color of the authority of the United States, or are committed for trial before some court of the same, or are necessary to be brought into court to testify."

Now the question naturally occurs, whether a criminal offence committed against the laws of the United States, or a statute of any State, comes within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States. I have no doubt in my mind that that court has no such jurisdiction. A reference to the Constitution, which defines the original powers of the court, will show my construction to be correct. In the third article, second section, it is declared. "In all cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and 'those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme 'Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the 'other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court 'shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law 'and fact, with such exceptions, and under such 'regulations, as the Congress shall make."

Does it not follow from these expressions that before the Supreme Court have original jurisdiction (for the issuing a writ of habeas corpus is an original and not an appellate power) they must have that power within the terms of the Constitution, viz: "In all cases affecting Ambassadors, 'other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in 'which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court 'shall have original jurisdiction."

Whence then the power to issue a writ of habeas corpus in any other case? Mr. Burwell said it appeared to him that the Constitution did not confer the power to interfere with ordinary offences committed within the United States, and he thought it was at this time peculiarly expedient to make some legislative provision on this subject.

What will the consequence be of this doctrine of the Supreme Court? That a man confined in any part of the United States may be released, however distant from the place where the court sits, and be brought to Washington to determine whether he has been legally committed. In all cases, unless committed on testimony in writing, he must be discharged, for it is usual to recognise witnesses to attend at a particular time and place, and if the person accused be brought up without such witnesses, what is to prevent him from going at large? It is most manifest that the exercise of this power will be found extremely inconvenient; and as in his opinion it could be only exercised in contravention of the Constitution and public utility, Mr. B. said he trusted the Legislature would take steps to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and to prevent persons going at large who ought to be confined for their trial.

What would be the effect of the doctrine contended for by the gentleman from Delaware, that it was the duty of every judge even at the risk of his life, to issue a writ of habeas corpus? Considering the extreme distance of one part of the United States from another, it would be impossible for a judge to ascertain whether the individual was confined under the authority of the United States or of a particular State; and consequently, under such an injunction, he would be compelled either to violate the authority of the States, or expose himself to a most severe and imminent peril. Mr. B. said he made this statement to show the necessity of making provision for such a case.

Mr. B. said he had only to add, that if the Supreme Court had a right to issue a writ of habeas corpus in every case, and this were enjoined under a severe penalty, instead of having their jurisdiction narrowed down to particular cases, as was undoubtedly intended by the Constitution, they may interfere in the whole criminal jurisdiction of the United States. It was for these reasons that he offered the amendment. As to the other branches of the subject, he had already given his ideas upon them, which it was unnecessary to repeat.

Mr. Burwell then moved to insert after the word States—"and the necessity of defining the 'power of the Supreme Court of the United States 'in issuing the writ of habeas corpus." This amendment was agreed to—ayes 76.

Mr. Jackson said he did not vote for the amendment, and should not vote for the resolution, which he thought more exceptionable in its present than in its original form. He had before contended that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was amply protected. He had stated that every judge, according to their own claim, did possess the power of issuing it—not under any particular law, but under a Constitutional provision, he presumed. He demanded whether that House could change a Constitutional provision? The Constitution declares that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." The amendment agreed to went to narrow this privilege, by taking from the Judges of the Supreme Court the right of issuing the writ. Is not this, said Mr. Jackson, a suspension of it? If the power be taken from this court, may it not be taken from another? What is there to require a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, that did not require it a few days since when the subject was before us? Are there any imperious circumstances that require it? No; gentlemen who have indulged themselves in animadversions on the conduct of the officer who has made certain recent arrests, and which have given rise to this motion, have failed in showing that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is not amply secured. It is in vain to say, that because we fix a penalty to disobedience, or resort to the sanguinary system of some gentlemen, proposing even death, we shall prevent the violator of the Constitution from feeling power and forgetting right. He who is disposed to violate the Constitution will do it, even at the risk of death. We have affirmed, however, that any person whose rights are infringed, may obtain justice; and that the court whose writ shall be refused has a right to issue an attachment. To deny the existence of this power, would be to reduce our tribunals to mere pie poudre courts. Although we have called on gentlemen to show the necessity of legislating at this, or any other time, on this subject, they have contented themselves with declamations and discussions merely political. It seems, however, that the zeal of gentlemen to protect the privileges of the citizen, as might have been readily foreseen, has already induced them to vote for ousting the Supreme Court of its jurisdiction.

Mr. Burwell explained. He said his colleague certainly had not attended to the amendment. It only instituted an inquiry, and did not propose absolutely an abridgement of powers. The arguments used in its favor showed clearly that a distinction had been expressly taken between the powers vested in the Supreme Court by the Constitution and those conferred by the law of Congress. Indeed, it was intended to expound a law of whose ambiguity the judges themselves had complained.

Mr. Jackson.—I assure my friend from Virginia, that no person is less disposed than myself to misrepresent his opinions. [Mr. J. here read the provisions of the Constitution relative to the powers conferred on the Supreme Court of the United States.] We cannot impose on the Supreme Court any original jurisdiction. I indeed understand they refused to take it in the case of invalids. My objection is, as to the necessity of making any inquiry whatever into the subject, under the apprehension that it will have a tendency to narrow down the rights of the citizen. What are the arguments of my friend? That great inconvenience will flow from this decision of the Supreme Court—that a man confined, at a great distance, will apply by his attorney and obtain his discharge. But I say, if the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in this case be derived from the Constitution, we cannot, in this way, suspend it. If we say that this or that court shall not exercise that power, we may divest it altogether. This rage for inquiry without necessity is to me a most extraordinary political phenomenon. Has there been a single instance pointed out where a deficiency of power on the part of the court has been manifested? Is there in truth any such want of power? So far from this, many gentlemen are of opinion that the powers of our courts are already too great. I hope, therefore, unless the necessity is made manifest, we shall neither inquire nor legislate; and more especially, while we are expressing our solicitude for the rights of the citizen, we shall not take from him the right of appealing to the supreme tribunal of the country.

Mr. Bidwell.—The motion, as now amended, embraces two objects; to provide additional penalties for the security of the privilege of habeas corpus, and to define the powers of the Supreme Court as to issuing writs of habeas corpus. It is proposed to appoint a select committee to inquire into the expediency of making these provisions. Each member of this proposition is expressly predicated, by its mover upon particular recent occurrences; the one, upon the conduct of General Wilkinson, in seizing certain persons at New Orleans, and sending them to the seat of Government, under military arrest; the other, upon the late determination of a majority of the Supreme Court to exercise jurisdiction in a case of habeas corpus, for the discharge of some of those persons. With respect to both of these objects, and also as it respects the propriety of referring the question to a select committee, I am opposed to the motion, and hope it will not be adopted.

I do not, indeed, subscribe to the opinion, just now advanced by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Jackson,) that Congress have no Constitutional authority to define the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in cases of habeas corpus. Within the limits of the Constitution there is room for us to pass a law, defining and specifying their powers on this subject. But, sir, I will not give my vote in favor of an act for that purpose, pointed at a particular decision of the court, while they have other questions connected with it under their consideration.

I regret that this subject has been moved at the present time, and still more that the motion has been supported on the ground which has been taken in the debate. The ground of argument assumed by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. Broom,) who introduced the motion, and by other gentlemen who have followed him, was calculated to excite unpleasant personal and party sensibilities in the House, and to spread an unnecessary alarm abroad; and, if pursued, in the same latitude of discussion, will occupy the small remainder of the session, to the exclusion of many articles of business, which have already passed through the preparatory stages, and are ready to be definitively acted upon. Sir, the session is drawing to a close, and there are a very considerable number of bills, reports, and other matters on your table, which have been waiting several weeks for an opportunity to be called up. Whenever there has been an opening to call for an order of the day, you have seen gentlemen rising, from all quarters of the House, and endeavoring to anticipate each other in addressing the Chair, for the purpose of bringing forward the business of which they respectively have a particular charge. All this mass of business must be postponed, and all the labor of maturing it lost, by the unseasonable introduction of this question, and the extraordinary mode of reasoning by which its advocates have chosen to support it. They will not suffer us to vote in silence, but drive us to the necessity of repelling their observations and explaining our own views of the subject.

When the gentleman first moved to refer this resolution to a Committee of the Whole, I was in favor of the reference, because I wished to give him a fair opportunity to submit any amendment of our law which he might have in contemplation and because I thought such a question could, according to the rules of order, be discussed with more propriety in the Committee of the Whole than in the House. But it was thought proper to take a different course. The discussion proceeded in the House. The mover has explained his object, and been very fully heard in support of it. After two days debate, he has changed his ground, and substituted the present motion, of which the necessary effect, and of course the design, is to withdraw from the House the first decision of the main question, by referring it to a select committee for inquiry. That would be a departure from the usual and regular course of proceeding. The principle ought to be first settled in the whole House, and, if necessary, a committee afterwards appointed to report the details. I can see no useful purpose to be answered by appointing a select committee of inquiry: for such a committee could have access to no other sources of information, as to law or facts, than such as are already before us and before the public. They would possess no better means of judging, for themselves, than the same gentlemen now have in common with other members; nor would the House feel bound by their report. Suppose a committee to be appointed, and to report that it is, or that it is not, expedient to make the proposed legislative provisions. The question would come back, and meet us again in the House. In this point of view a commitment would be useless; and, for that reason, I shall vote against it.

But, sir, is it necessary or proper, if we had leisure, to pass a law on the subject, at the present time? The principal argument in favor of it has been drawn from the recent transactions at New Orleans. We have been told that the Constitution has been violated, and that Congress ought to act on the occasion; otherwise, we may become familiarized to encroachments on the Constitution, until all respect for that sacred instrument may be lost. Sir, this argument is a two-edged sword. It cuts both ways. If, for a temporary purpose, the trumpet of alarm is sounded, when there is no real danger; if, by way of appeal to the public, we are urged to legislate upon a suggestion that the Constitution has been violated when there has been no such violation, or none but what the ordinary course of law is competent to correct and redress; we may be familiarized to charges of that nature, until we become insensible, indifferent, and disinclined to interpose, when legislative interposition may be really necessary.

For the sake of argument, let it be admitted that a Constitutional right has been infringed.

Does it follow that Congress ought to legislate on the occasion? Take the instance which, in order to bring the subject home to ourselves, has been put. Suppose a member of this House, in contempt of his Constitutional exemption from arrest, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace, is arrested on civil process, and imprisoned in this territory, or carried out of it, if you please, under arrest; would Congress feel themselves called upon to pass a law, in consequence of such infringement of a Constitutional privilege? No, sir. The legal remedies already provided would be sufficient. The party injured might sue out a habeas corpus for his discharge, in the first place, and afterwards commence his action for damages, to be assessed by a jury, upon a full consideration of all the circumstances of aggravation or alleviation; and the officer or person who did the injury would be still further liable to be indicted by a grand jury and tried and punished by the proper tribunal. These, sir, are the existing provisions of law. And I am not willing to disparage the right of jury trial, so solemnly recognised in the Constitution, by treating it as inadequate to give relief. It is a privilege by no means inferior to the habeas corpus. It is one, indeed, without which that cannot be enforced. It is a legal and Constitutional remedy; and no friend to our laws and Constitution will attempt to degrade it. I am not pretending that it is perfect. Imperfection is stamped upon everything that is human. Courts and juries are not infallible; they are not inaccessible to those passions and prejudices which are common to men in all situations. But they are not more liable to the influence of erroneous or improper considerations than legislatures are. No safer institution than that of trial by court and jury, has been devised to redress infractions of personal rights. It is open to all persons who think they have sustained an injury, and is as free from objection as the lot of humanity will admit.

The violation of a personal right, whether Constitutional or only legal, cannot require legislative interference, unless it has resulted from some defect in the existing law; and even then, an additional act ought not to be interposed at a time and in a manner calculated to make an impression on judicial questions, which may have grown out of the subject. Legislative influence upon the judiciary would be as improper as judicial influence upon the legislature.

It has been admitted, for it could not be denied, that an additional law cannot, consistently with the Constitution, operate retrospectively, so as to have a legal effect upon rights or liabilities, which have already accrued. And surely a legislature ought not, by acts of pointed legislation, to produce any other than a legal effect upon such existing cases, by prejudging a question or prejudicing the public mind, and thus influencing the judicial determination of it. Such, in my opinion would be the tendency of the measure now proposed to be adopted in consequence of an alleged breach of the Constitution. The charge is, that General Wilkinson has violated the Constitutional privilege of habeas corpus; and the object of that part of the motion is to prescribe additional sanctions to secure the benefit of this writ. The mover (Mr. Broom) has told us that he would inflict upon any violator of it such a penalty as would ruin him. And a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. Randolph) has declared that he would even punish disobedience to a writ of habeas corpus with death. The question is, whether such severe and sanguinary punishments are necessary. I think not. Indeed, I perceive no present necessity for any additional sanctions. Has any court or judge of the United States denied a habeas corpus, upon proper application? I have heard of no such denial since the cases which have been stated to have occurred in Pennsylvania in 1794, and those were not occasioned by any deficiency of law. There has been no recent instance. Has any officer refused to serve a writ of habeas corpus? No such refusal is pretended. Has any person, on whom a writ of habeas corpus, from a court or judge of the United States, has been served, refused to obey it? No instance of such disobedience has been officially communicated to us, according to my understanding and recollection of the official communications. It has, I am sensible, been charged upon General Wilkinson, and, in proof of the charge, a gentleman from Vermont has read, from a newspaper, that officer's return to a writ granted by the Territorial court of Orleans. For it is to be observed, that the application was not made to the court of the United States there, but to that of the Territory. The General's return was expressed in the language of a soldier and not of a lawyer. It did not state, with technical precision, whether Dr. Bollman was within his control at the service of the writ. I may be incorrect, for I have not particularly investigated the subject, and it may not be very material, but I understand the fact to have been, that Dr. Bollman had been sent from New Orleans, on his way to this city, when the writ was served on General Wilkinson. This appears from the further proceedings of the court, as published in the same paper; from which the first return has been read.

[Here a Message from the President was received and read, after which Mr. B. proceeded.]

When the Message was announced, I was noticing an extract from the proceedings of the Territorial court at New Orleans, which I now beg leave to read.

"In the Superior Court of Orleans, December 26th. In the matter of the Habeas Corpus ad subjiciendum, directed to General Wilkinson, to produce the body of Dr. Erick Bollman; on motion of Mr. Livingston (in behalf of Mr. Alexander, the attorney upon record) that General Wilkinson be required to make a further and more explicit return to the said habeas corpus, or show cause to-morrow morning, at the opening of the court, why an attachment should not issue against him: It was ordered, that the rule be granted, and that a copy thereof be immediately delivered by the sheriff to General Wilkinson. On the next day, on motion of Mr. Duncan, in behalf of General Wilkinson, and on reading the following, as an amended return to the abovementioned habeas corpus:

'The undersigned, commanding the Army of the United States, takes on himself the responsibility for the arrest of Dr. Erick Bollman, on a charge of misprision of treason against the United States, and has adopted measures for his safe delivery to the Executive of the United States. The body of the said Erick Bollman is now, and was at the time of the writ of habeas corpus, to which this return relates, out of the possession, power, or custody of the undersigned.

'JAS. WILKINSON.'

"Ordered, That the same be received and filed, and the rule nisi of attachment be discharged."

The fact is here stated, as I have understood it. Dr. Bollman was on his passage to this place, before the writ of habeas corpus, sued out by his friends, was served on General Wilkinson; whose transaction, therefore, in whatever light it is to be viewed, in relation to the laws and authorities of that Territory, was not a disobedience to this writ of habeas corpus, but a military seizure and transmission of a person from New Orleans to Washington, under an avowed responsibility, and upon the principle that it was necessary for the public safety. At any rate it does not appear to have resulted from a want of penalty, or any defect whatever in the habeas corpus laws of that Territory, whose courts and laws, and not those of the United States, were resorted to for relief.

One case has been mentioned in the newspapers, in which a writ of habeas corpus, issued under the authority of the United States, was not obeyed. An officer at Charleston, South Carolina, it is said, instead of producing Dr. Bollman, in obedience to a writ from the district judge, transmitted him to Washington, because the orders of General Wilkinson, in general terms, directed his transmission, without any particular instructions respecting a habeas corpus. The officer seems to have considered it his duty to obey the orders of his commander, without regard to any interfering lawyer or civil process. I am of opinion that he erred, and has exposed himself to punishment, as well as to damages. But his error does not appear to have been wilful, nor to have resulted from any defect in the law, but from an erroneous military principle. The same principle, however, has, at the present session, found very respectable advocates on the floor of this House. Yes, sir, in the case of Captain George Little, gentlemen held that a military or naval officer is not bound to take notice of any law in opposition to, or even in explanation of, the orders of his superior. It will be recollected that I opposed that doctrine, although I admitted that an officer, civil or military, acting contrary to law, through misapprehension of its meaning in a doubtful case, or in some great emergency not provided for by law, might be equitably entitled to indemnification. Damages had been recovered against Captain Little, for doing an illegal act, in pursuance of orders from the late President of the United States, and Congress have passed a law to indemnify for those damages. The Executive orders, under which he claimed, taken in connexion with the law, which was referred to in the orders, did not appear to me to warrant the transaction, which has been adjudged to be be illegal, and for which the damages were recovered. I did not, therefore, vote with the majority in favor of his claim. But gentlemen who supported it on the ground I have mentioned, will, if they are consistent, be so far from inferring a necessity for further penalties, from the case of Captain Kaltiesas at Charleston, that they will be ready to grant him an indemnification, if he shall be found to have acted honestly, according to his understanding of his orders. By indemnification, I do not mean an act of indemnity, in the British sense of the term, pleadable in bar both to an action for damages and to a prosecution for an offence. Such an act might here be considered unconstitutional and void. A remuneration for damages incurred has been the mode of indemnification adopted by our Government.

On this subject an example has been quoted for our instruction, from English history. It was a proclamation, issued in derogation of law, by the King, with the advice of the celebrated Lords Chatham and Camden, on a great national exigency. The measure was generally approved and applauded throughout the nation. The Parliament were ready to sanction it. But, instead of accepting an act of indemnity, those Ministers undertook to justify it, as legal, upon the principle of necessity. In that they erred. When the question came before the court, for judicial consideration, Lord Mansfield decided against the doctrine of his great political rivals, and I think his decision was correct. As a judge or a juror, I should have condemned them. But, sir, if instead of justifying the proclamation, as legalized by State necessity, the Ministers had acknowledged their responsibility for it, and thrown themselves upon the justice of their Government, had I been a member of the British Parliament, I would have voted them an indemnity. Their error consisted, not in doing an illegal act, for the public good, but in doing it under color of legal authority, when the law did not authorize it. Whether General Wilkinson's conduct has been correct or erroneous in other respects, he has not fallen into this error of those celebrated English statesmen. He has not pretended that, in seizing the persons alluded to and transmitting them to the seat of Government, he was justified by orders or by law. He has not cast the responsibility upon any other officer or department of Government. He has explicitly assumed it all to himself, and put himself on the candor of his country for indemnification. If it shall appear that he has acted honestly, for the safety of the Army and the preservation of the Union, under the pressure of such urgent necessity, as he professes, I trust he will be indemnified. On the contrary, if it shall turn out, upon future investigation, that he has acted unnecessarily and wantonly, from motives of malice or resentment, he will undoubtedly be left to suffer the consequences. I give no opinion of the merits of his conduct. I hope the House will not, at present, give an opinion, or adopt any measure calculated to have a bearing on the question. It is premature. We have not sufficient information. We have not a statement of all the facts, nor the evidence in support of the facts, which are stated. In due time an inquiry will be proper, and doubtless will be instituted. General Wilkinson will probably demand it himself. But it would be unfair and unjust, as well as impolitic, to anticipate it.

While I feel this to be an interesting subject, I have little apprehension of the danger, which has been so eloquently and pathetically foretold. Our Constitution, our laws, our liberty, and property, are more endangered by acts done silently, under color of law, by a constructive assumption or extension of powers, than by any which may be done openly, in the face of the nation, under a known and acknowledged responsibility, subject to the approbation or disapprobation of the Government, after a deliberate examination of the whole case. The temptation to pass such an ordeal cannot be so strong as to be dangerous.

The privilege of habeas corpus is guarantied to the Territory of Orleans, as fully as to the other territories of the United States. Their courts have cognizance of that writ. It is allowed, and exercised, and enforced. The regulation of its forms and sanctions, in common with other subjects of territorial legislation, belongs to their own legislature, subject to the revision of Congress. It does not appear that amendments or alterations in their habeas corpus laws are necessary. If they were, this is not the proper mode or time to introduce them. Gentlemen who argue in favor of the motion before us, from the recent occurrences at New Orleans, have mistaken the case. The remedy which they propose would not touch it, and therefore could not prevent a repetition of it. If any legislative measure is to be predicated upon General Wilkinson's transactions, in seizing suspected persons, at a crisis of danger, and transmitting them to the seat of Government, under a military arrest, it ought to be an act to define and restrict the powers of a military commander, or a direct inquiry into his official conduct, neither of which would, in my opinion, be seasonable or proper at the present time. In no point of view can I perceive an immediate necessity for a legislative definition of the powers of the Supreme Court, in issuing writs of habeas corpus, or for further penalties to enforce such writs, when issued by that or any other court or judge of the United States. Although I consider this as well as other branches of our criminal code susceptible of improvement, and at a suitable time shall be willing to unite in any reasonable efforts to procure a deliberate revision of them, yet, under the existing circumstances, and at this late period of the session, it does not appear to me expedient to attempt it. But, whether it be expedient or not, is a question which, in point of principle and regularity of proceeding, ought to be decided in the whole House, and not referred to a select committee for inquiry. I shall, therefore, be constrained to give my vote against the motion now under consideration.

Mr. Quincy.—So long as an intention appeared to make this a party question, I had no inclination to intermeddle with it. The subject seems to me to be of too high a nature, and too deeply to be connected with the rights and liberties of us all, to be examined under those narrow and temporary views, which party spirit necessarily introduces. Since the discussion has assumed a milder aspect, I shall offer a few considerations; limiting myself to a very simple and brief elucidation of the subject, in a point of view which no other gentleman has taken of it, as yet, on this floor.

I cannot agree with those gentlemen who maintain that, in the arrest and transportation of Bollman and Swartwout, they can see no violation of the rights of individuals. The privileges of the Constitution are as much the inheritance of the humblest and the most depraved, as of the most elevated or virtuous citizen. To be seized by a military force, to be concealed and hurried beyond the protection of the civil power, and to be sent a thousand miles for trial, in a place where the crime charged was not committed, I humbly conceive are violations of individual rights, and of the Constitution. I am not, however, prepared to say, that in no possible case they can be pardoned; nor, with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Randolph,) that in no case, I would consent to indemnify a military commander for making such an arrest. A case might exist, when it might be the duty of a Legislature thus to indemnify. I agree, however, that it must be an extreme case, and that the party to be indemnified must evince that he had himself no voluntary agency in producing the state of things which made such an unconstitutional exercise of power necessary to the safety of the State. I give no opinion concerning the conduct of General Wilkinson. The events which happened at New Orleans have no other relation to the subject before the House than this: They have turned the attention of reflecting men in this nation to the nature of the security they possess against similar violence; and, in common with other reflecting men, it has become our duty not only to understand the nature of that security, but also to supply, as soon as possible, any deficiencies we may discover in it.

The only question is, have this people the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus secured to them as fully and effectually as the Constitution intended, and as wise and prudent men ought to desire? I answer, unequivocally, they have not. So far as relates to cases under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, we have virtually no writ of habeas corpus. And for this plain reason, that we have none of the sanctions of the writ; we have none of those penalties, without which the writ of habeas corpus is a dead letter: particularly in all cases in which the state of party passions, or of any predominant power, leads to the oppression of an individual.

The writ of habeas corpus and the penalties by which it is enforced, and in which the great benefit of the privilege consists, are distinct things in their nature. The former was known to the English common law, and although, at all periods of English history, it was held a very precious right, yet were its provisions found wholly inefficacious against arbitrary power, until after the statute of Charles II. called by Englishmen their second Magna Charta. This statute gave penalties unknown to the common law. If a judge refuses to grant, or an officer refuses to execute the writ, he is liable to a penalty of five hundred pounds sterling, and similar sanctions annexed to other neglects of the precept. The House will observe, that all these penalties are securities given to personal liberty, additional to those which exist at common law, and are not substituted for them. These penalties are annexed for disobedience to the writ, not as indemnification for the injury. All the other remedies against the judge, or the party imprisoning, remain unimpaired.

The question recurs, does the Federal Constitution, by securing to us "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus," secure to us those sanctions of the writ, which constitute in England its characteristic security? If the Constitution had re-enacted the statute of Charles, there could be no doubt. But will gentlemen seriously assert, that a penal statute of another country can, by construction, be declared the law of this, so as to make our citizens obnoxious to its penalties? If that statute be our national law, how was it obtained? Re-enacting statute we have none. And "the United States, as a Federal Government, have no common law," if we give credit to declarations daily made upon this floor, or respect the opinions of one of the highest law authorities in this nation. I refer to the opinion of Judge Chase, in the case of the United States against Worrall. 2 Dallas 394.

This view of the subject is certainly sufficient to satisfy this House, that their security for this great privilege is, at least, uncertain; and is not this reason enough, for this Legislature to commence an inquiry into the nature of that security, and the additional provisions it requires? This at present is the only question.

But the gentlemen ask "what need of further penalties?" "If the judge refuses the writ, is there not impeachment?" "Against the person illegally imprisoning another, is not an action for damages?" I answer—Both these securities for the personal liberty of the citizen existed, and do still exist in England, as fully as they do here, yet was it ever before heard that these were reasons against enacting that celebrated statute of Charles or, were ever urged as evidence that its provisions were needless, or useless? The penalties of that statute are guarantees of the liberties of the citizen, additional to those which result from the law and the Constitution. The principle of that statute is, to rest satisfied with nothing short of the actual liberation of the person from illegal imprisonment, in the shortest time possible. To this end all its provisions tend. It will not leave a citizen to languish in prison, in expectation of the result of the slow progress of legislative inquisition, or for the purpose of ultimately qualifying him to receive a heavy conpensation in damages. Impeachment is always a dubious, and an action for false imprisonment often an inadequate security for the observance of the writ of habeas corpus. Great violations of the privilege of this writ can never happen, unless in times of great violence. In such times, what hope of an impeachment against a judge, who abuses his authority in coincidence with the views of a prevailing party? And as to damages, is personal liberty to be estimated by money? And if it were, what certainty that the person guilty of the illegal arrest will be competent to pay the damages recovered? In the case of seizure by a military power, can it ever be expected, from the universal pecuniary deficiencies of the soldiers, that damages will be realized, even should the civil arm be competent to enforce an execution?

The penalties affixed by the statute of Charles, on the contrary, assure the obedience of the courts and officers of justice, independent of all party influences which may happen to prevail in the nation, and secure personal liberty by pecuniary perils, suspended over the heads of men, whose situation in society is such as, in general, makes the attainment of the penalty certain, should it be incurred. Upon the whole, those who oppose the present motion seem to me be reduced to this dilemma; either they must acknowledge that they are content that the citizens of these United States should possess less security for their liberties than the subjects of the law of England enjoy for theirs, or they are reduced to the necessity of adopting the doctrine that the statute penalties of another country may by construction become the laws of this nation; than which, I can conceive nothing more monstrous or absurd.

In this discussion it has been my wish to avoid all notice of the party and personal invectives which have been uttered. The question is too important to be mingled with feelings and passions of these descriptions. And the circumstances of the times and of the nation, seem to me to claim from us a contempt for these local and ephemeral distinctions.

Mr. Gregg said he did not rise to enter into a discussion of the merits of the question, but merely to move its postponement indefinitely; the propriety of which motion, he thought, must present itself to the mind of every gentleman. From the time which had been already spent in this debate, it must be evident that before it was finished the session would be passed away. A considerable portion of the business on the table the public interest required to be acted upon, and scarce time sufficient remained to give it the necessary attention. Mr. G. said he should have had no objection to the resolution if offered at an earlier period of the session; and he believed even at this late period he should be willing to let it take place of other business, if he considered it indispensably necessary. But, as he did not believe this to be the case, he trusted the postponement would be agreed to.

Mr. Newton.—I presume I may be permitted, notwithstanding the motion has been tried, to go fully into the subject before the House. I hope this House will not indefinitely postpone it. If ever there was a subject within the attention of an enlightened Legislature, it is the subject before us. Every subject that regards the liberty of the citizen should be received with reverence and respect by the votaries of liberty. If we can better the situation of the people of the United States, and keep from them, under all circumstances, the hand of oppression, it is our duty to do it, and to pay attention to whatever is likely to eventuate in such an issue. I shall not consider this case as the basis of an impeachment. The only true inquiry at present is, whether the writ of habeas corpus is sufficiently fortified by Legislative provisions? I will not commit my understanding so far as to decide on the conduct of the Commander-in-chief. If he has done wrong, let him be answerable to the laws of his country; much less will I talk of indemnifying him. For this reason, because the jury before which the case may come, may, under such circumstances, have regard, not to his circumstances, but to the Treasury of the United States.

It is said that the quarter from which the resolution comes gives it a suspicious appearance. It is true I am of that class of men who may say to the gentlemen with whom this motion originates, as was said of old to the Trojans, timeo Danaos, et dona ferentes. But I am willing to examine the proposition, though it comes from that quarter—to sift the good from the evil. If gentlemen submit to us a good proposition, I am ready to treat it with all the respect it merits, and I will give all the weight which they may deserve to propositions which they, feeling power and forgetting right, in past times refused to allow. God forbid that we should act on principles that we could not justify. Yes, I congratulate the mover of this resolution, that he has arisen from the long slumbering nap in which he has been involved, and that he has all at once been illuminated by the splendor of liberty. I congratulate him on this circumstance, and I assure him of my most hearty concurrence in the measure he has brought forward.

My friend and colleague, from Virginia, has offered a most important amendment to this resolution. The Supreme Court of the United States, after having this all important case for a long time under advisement, and after an argument from the bar, are again afloat on the ocean of uncertainty, have started some new doubts, and have asked the gentlemen of the bar to come forward with a new argument. If this is the fact, does it not show the necessity of our attending to the subject; and of some new Legislative provisions upon it? I am for defining the power of our courts. I wish to understand the extent of their prerogatives; and particularly whether they have appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases; before whom criminals are to be brought; who are to grant writs of habeas corpus, and admit to bail?

These are all considerations of importance, and constitute the reasons which induce me to vote for referring this resolution to a select committee. But, say gentlemen, we cannot mature this subject this session. Perhaps so; but is this a sufficient reason for not commencing the investigation, for comparing our ideas on the subject, and going forward as far as we can in our progress towards a decision? I, for one, shall always be in favor of an inquiry into subjects that have a reference to personal liberty.

Another of my colleagues has not only stated an objection to the original resolution, but likewise to the amendment. His objection is, that we are filching from the Supreme Court a power conferred on them by the Constitution. Let us examine this question a little. Do not the judges of the Supreme Court, in connexion with the district judges, compose the circuits of the United States? We say it is doubtful whether the former judges, sitting as a Supreme Court, have a right to take this subject into consideration. It has never been denied that they have a right in their respective circuits, at their chambers, to grant writs of habeas corpus. This has never been denied—this I say is law.

This subject has been spread over an immense extent of ground. The single point, however, at issue, is, whether we will commit this resolution, in order merely to obtain correct facts and information, which shall present the subject in such a form as shall enable us to act understandingly upon it. I am not at present in favor of acting definitively upon it; but merely for inquiry. So circumstanced, I presume our proceedings cannot injure any individuals implicated in this business, as nothing we can do can have a retrospective effect. These are my reasons for voting in favor of the present motion.

Mr. Smilie.—I have but a few observations to offer on this subject. At an early stage of this debate I expressed myself in favor of the resolution. I thought it proper in itself, for this reason: I had doubts in my own mind whether the writ of habeas corpus was secured by the penalties necessary to give it effect. I had endeavored to inform myself by conversing with professional men upon the subject; finding that they differed in opinion I thought it proper to inquire into it. But, like some other subjects introduced into this House, I think it has been spoiled by the mode of treating it. I had flattered myself that it would have been considered as a subject of no one party; but as one in which all parties were equally interested. Instead, however, of treating it on its own merits, it appears to me that the mover and other gentlemen have involved themselves in invectives against the Commander-in-chief and on points altogether unconnected with the main subject. It is admitted by the mover of this resolution that there may be circumstances under which it might be the duty of a public officer to depart from the laws and take the responsibility upon himself. The gentlemen, notwithstanding, undertook to arraign the conduct of the Commander in-chief without his being heard. Surely this is not the tribunal before which that gentleman ought to appear in case he has done wrong; and if it were, in justice, he ought to be heard before he is condemned. Yesterday a doctrine was stated of a most extraordinary nature, though I admit it is the only doctrine on which gentlemen can justify condemning the Commander-in-chief without a hearing. The doctrine is this, that under no necessity whatever can an officer be justified for departing from the law.

Mr. J. Randolph explained.—He said he believed there might be situations in which a departure from the law might be palliated, if not justified. He had no doubt of it; but he must be permitted to add, if the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts were intended to bear on what he said, that that gentleman had misunderstood or misstated him. He had stated a case of a known, acknowledged violation of the Constitution of the United States by a military force. That was the thing. For instance, as if in sitting, as they had done some few years since, till daydawn, balloting who should be President, under the impression that all would go to anarchy and confusion but for his superior power and wisdom, a commander at the head of a military banditti had stepped in to tell us who should be President. If the military had a right to put the Constitution at defiance, they had as good a right in one case as in another.

Mr. Smilie.—The gentleman's explanation is perfectly satisfactory. I certainly did misunderstand him. It is well known that military men have departed, and must depart in some instances, from the laws. For instance, it is justifiable for the commander of a garrison, under some circumstances, to burn the suburbs of a city. Since then it is admitted there may be a justification for a departure from the laws, such justification must depend on the degree of necessity that may exist. And my conclusion is, that as we are not acquainted with the circumstances of this case, it is premature to pass judgment on those implicated in it. On this point I coincide with the gentleman from Massachusetts. We ought entirely to consider the subject before us on its own merits. The next question, therefore, is, whether we are in the situation to make the proposed inquiry. On this point I am sure no gentleman will undertake to say, even were we to suspend the whole business before us, we should be able to mature and finish before the close of the session a business of this importance; and if we did, I fear it would be very incorrectly done. Inasmuch then as we cannot get through this business during the present session, it is proper in my opinion to postpone it until the next. I pledge myself that I shall then be as willing as any gentleman on this floor to take it up and give it a deliberate investigation.

Mr. J. Randolph.—When the gentleman from Pennsylvania made this motion, I was really apprehensive that it would have an effect different from that intended—that it would have the effect of protracting this debate. We have had a long discussion, and when every member is ready to give his vote on the subject, and most of the members who desire it, have in all probability delivered their sentiments, a motion to postpone the subject is offered. What is the consequence? Every member who has spoken on the main question acquires the right to speak twice on this.

I am sorry for the declaration made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I understood him to be friendly to this measure. But how am I to reconcile his friendship with the negative vote which he means to give? For will he or any other gentleman point out a substantial difference between negativing and postponing this resolution? This is nothing more or less than an ingenious mode of quieting a tender conscience—to induce gentlemen to vote for postponing, what on principle they cannot vote against. Suppose in the case of a petition from Stephen Sayre, or Oliver Pollock, or any other of the claimants so steadily before us, a motion should be made to postpone their case indefinitely. What would the gentleman from Pennsylvania say? That there was no substantial difference between postponing and negativing it. I do confess, sir, if I was opposed to this measure, I would get up and say so—I would vote against it—I would come out manfully and decide on its merits; and I trust gentlemen opposed to it from principle will have the magnanimity to reject the postponement and try the strength of the House on the main question.

I certainly mean no disrespect to either of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, because where I do not feel disrespect, I would not express it. But the motion made by one of those gentlemen and advocated by the other, gives an unfaithful representative of the people an opportunity of shrinking from his Constitutional responsibility, and, as such, ought to be resisted. A gentleman goes home, and is asked, what did you do in the case of the habeas corpus? Did you vote for or against it? He replies—no, I did not vote against it—I only voted for postponing it indefinitely. Well, what is the meaning of this Parliamentary phrase? Though it is exactly the same as voting against a measure, yet, addressed to the unlearned ear of the planter, it gives an opportunity to every man afraid to stand on his own responsibility to cheat his constituents.

With regard to improper topics and extrinsic considerations introduced into this debate, no one can be more sensible of, or have greater reason to regret it, than myself; but, if urged by me, they have been urged in self-defence. I may truly say I did not begin the battle. For on the first day's discussion, when the mover was making a lengthy speech on this subject, I was engaged in the committee room, and only came into the House when about to adjourn; but, notwithstanding, I heard enough to convince me that principles had been broached which, let them be broached wherever they may, will always meet my reprobation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts must certainly have labored under some strange misapprehension when he conceived that I quoted the case of the prohibition of the exportation of corn from Great Britain, by royal proclamation, with the view he ascribes to me. I certainly did not. I did not say that if the Ministers had acknowledged a violation of law, and had thrown themselves on the mercy of their country, it would not, according to the usages of that country, have been proper to have passed a bill of indemnity. I quoted this case to show that when the known and acknowledged friends of freedom become so intoxicated with power as to abandon the strong bulwark of the Constitution, those opposed to them will turn their batteries against them—to show that it did not become the gentleman from Massachusetts, if indeed he is the friend of freedom, to quit the true old Constitutional ground, and suffer it to be taken by those in opposition. And in illustration of this observation I stated, that that cunning Scotchman, Mansfield, under similar circumstances, had taken the true ground of the Constitution against Chatham and Camden, its loudest advocates, and had thus defeated them with their own weapons.

I am sorry to be obliged to trouble the House with any more of that idle declamation which, it seems, is totally useless, except to serve the purpose, at various times, of replying to itself. But this declamation has even in this respect one advantage, often found wanting to the most solid argument, viz: that it is a satisfactory reply to something—that it has at least the power of answering itself—and is indued with properties of echo—that it is not "unheard, unknown." There has been a dispute in the world from time immemorial between wit and dullness—between imagination and judgment. So we have been told, though some who cultivate the sceptical philosophy dispute it. But this impression has been so long attempted to be made, that there is not a precise or formal coxcomb that does not on the score of dullness arrogate to himself judgment and profound wisdom. While I am willing to allow that declamation, or the powers of an effervescent imagination, are no evidences of wisdom, the House must admit that the mere dullness of a special pleader without his accuracy does not imply any pretensions to knowledge. The truth is, that on this as on other subjects, it has been my misfortune to come to the House too unprepared. I knew nothing of the subject until it was brought under discussion. I got up yesterday, as I have to-day, to say what first came into my head, and in this way I hope I shall be permitted to go on.

However the gentleman from Massachusetts may have professed his anxiety to avoid committing himself by giving an opinion in the present case, he has given a broad hint of the propriety of indemnifying the commander-in-chief in this instance, if he has acted illegally, by the allusion which he has made to the case of Captain Little, to which he might have added that of Captain Murray. Let us examine the analogy of these cases, and see whether the gentleman from Massachusetts with all his precision and ingenuity, is able to make out a similitude between them. The cases of Little and Murray were instances of military men obeying the orders of their military superiors. If it were proposed in the present instance to mulct the young officers who have made these arrests, those cases might with fairness have been cited, they might tell you that in doing so they obeyed their superior officers, and that they could not stand disputing their power lest they should be broken by a court martial. Does the gentleman say there is a similitude between the cases of Little and Murray, and the case of a commander of your army, (supposing him to have contravened the law) and that he would have the same excuse for such contravention as an inferior officer? Does he mean to prepare the House for a justification of the Commander-in-chief on this ground? I hope and trust not. I may speak at random, but I cannot believe his conduct, such as it has been represented to have been, can have been justified either by the instructions or the approbation of his superior officer. But even if it should appear to be the case that he received such instructions from the highest Executive authority, the only thing which can be said is, that the Commander-in-chief has acted under the orders of his superior, as in the cases of Little and Murray. But did the House mean to say, when they voted an indemnity to Little and Murray for obeying the orders of the Executive, in cases where the civil and military authority were combined, that because this conduct of an inferior officer was justified by the orders of his superior, there was therefore no blame attached to the Executive? I hope not. I trust in God not. I should have been sorry to have seen those claims passed, to give a sanction to the departure of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of State from the laws of the land. It will not, therefore, follow that, because the House considered the inferior officer not culpable, they also considered the superior, who gave the orders, free from censure. Let us then hear no more in justification of the Commander-in-chief, unless gentlemen show that, instead of acting on his own responsibility, he acted on that of his superior.

I consider the whole of this business as one of the most unfortunate kind that could have happened to the United States. If we had acquired Louisiana by force of arms or conquest, we could scarcely have inspired the people of that country with greater indignation than by these events—in which it is yet to be seen whether those people are at all concerned; or whether they are not standing like sheep, suffering the wolves to pass without disturbance—events which must sow the seeds of lasting misfortune, unless healed by a timely interposition of the Government. And nothing can have a more fatal effect than anything done by this House, or the other part of the Government, to sanction the conduct of the Commander-in-chief, taking it to be such as is ascribed to him. As a member of this House I am free to give my opinion of what would restore peace to that country—though out of doors I might not do it. The first step ought to be the immediate recall of every man directly or indirectly concerned in this business. You can hardly suppose, sir, that I look forward to be made their Governor, or desire on my recommendation to introduce a friend to that place. But I have no hesitation in saying that unless some such step be taken, the attachment of that country to the United States is lost forever. I would take such a step boldly—I would know nothing of their little disputes—I would act with the authority of a venerable parent, who, on returning home, found his children by the ears. I would correct them all, I would discountenance at once all such intrigues—I would recall every man who has directly or indirectly participated, or is suspected of having participated in them—I would, in short, rubout and begin again. It is an extremely unfortunate thing that the people of New Orleans, for the most part speaking the French language, a great part of them attached to the Crown of Spain—transferred to the United States by an honorable purchase—told they were about to taste the sweets of a Government of laws—told that arbitrary notions and lettres de cachet were to be proscribed—that the Constitution was not to be departed from, but that they were to enjoy all the blessings of citizens of the United States—it is extremely unfortunate that New Orleans should be the first place in which a lesson of military despotism should be taught. I deem it extremely unfortunate—it cannot tend to attach those people to the United States; it will, however, have another tendency—it will prevent every man of character from emigrating to that country, and instead of mixing the Americans with the French, the latter will be kept as a distinct class. For will any man, having the least regard to his rights, go to a place where he will be seized by a military commandant? Suppose, Mr. Speaker, such a thing had taken place in your country or mine. The military would not at this period be before the court—the spirit of the country would have long since settled the question. I recollect in 1798 or 1799, when the officers of the army were following their legal avocation of enlisting recruits, such was the spirit of detestation in which a standing army was held in my district, that these men were obliged to break up and move off. That spirit would scarcely endure the legal act of a man acting under legal authority, and yet we have now an apology for men acting in direct contravention of legal authority. Will any man point out a good cause for this change?

The gentleman from Massachusetts stated another case, which I think inapplicable. In case a member of this House should be arrested by the civil authority, he says he may obtain redress. There is no doubt of it. But suppose it was proposed to pass a law for the punishment of murder, and the gentleman should get up and say there is no necessity for such a law—the dead man may have redress without it!

The writ of habeas corpus is the only writ sanctioned by the Constitution. It is guarded from every approach except by the two Houses of Congress; and yet this writ thus acknowledged, thus specially designated, this second Magna Charta, as it has been called, is to be put on the footing of a common trespass. Really, when a man tells me that if imprisoned I may get damages, it requires no ghost to come and tell us that this may be done even without the writ of habeas corpus. But will gentleman point to any Legislative sanction by which the execution of this writ is guarded? Perhaps action on the case might be sustained for disobeying it; but suppose a judge should deny it. Impeach him, say gentlemen. But will gentlemen rely on that? That affords no certain punishment, and an uncertain punishment is inadequate. We want a certain and adequate remedy. The gentleman from Massachusetts is equally unfortunate in stating that I am the advocate of punishing with death every person concerned with an infraction of the writ of habeas corpus, or, as that gentleman stated it, for small and trivial offences.

Mr. Bidwell explained and observed that he had had allusion to the remarks of the gentleman relative to the slave trade.

Mr. J. Randolph.—I stated that I would make a military officer, acting under his own responsibility, acting as commander-in-chief, punishable with death for such an infraction. Did I, in saying so, also say that I would punish an inferior officer with death? Will any man deny that a military character arraying himself against the constitution of his country is worthy of death? I say he is a traitor. A commander-in-chief of an army, who, on his own responsibility, puts the constitution and laws of his country at defiance, is a traitor; and, supposing the case stated at New Orleans to be correctly stated, the Commander-in-chief is as much a traitor as any other man concerned in the conspiracy. Who are these traitors? Burr and Co. What are they about to do? To put down the civil authority by military force; and is there any substantial difference whether the civil authority is trampled under foot by Burr and his banditti, or by a commander-in-chief and his regular army? I will go farther. Suppose these measures for putting down Burr shall eventually prove to have been measures for putting up somebody else, in what will these men differ? In nothing. If the commander of an army, to give himself a false eclat, shall trample the Constitution under foot, shall go a certain length with conspirators, and finding his ground no longer tenable, shall determine to make up in zeal what he wanted in fidelity, he is guilty of treachery to the Constitution and laws—he is guilty of more—he is guilty of violating the principle respected by knaves—the principle of fidelity to each other.

We are told that a continual outcry against public men has a tendency to render the public mind callous, and by its familiarity tends to lose its effect. But do gentlemen believe that stepping forward in defence of the privilege of habeas corpus, flagrantly violated, (taking that to be the case,) is a mere peccadillo, about which the people ought not to be alarmed? If so, gentlemen are wofully deceived. The people are not so sound asleep as to be roused; and it was the duty of that gentleman and other gentlemen on his side to have come forward and have said—we are sorry that gentlemen have got the start of us, but their doing right shall not drive us into what is wrong. On this subject we will go all lengths with them, we will make an inquiry into the propriety of amending the laws—we will not be behind them in manifesting a zeal for the Constitution. If gentlemen had acted so, there would have been an end of the business at once; but it is saying they are friends of the measure, while they are acting as its enemies, that produces this distrust.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Quincy) has stated the difference that exists between the right of the writ of habeas corpus and the remedy. He has correctly stated that it is not intended as a remedy—not to allow an action for false imprisonment—but to prevent false imprisonment and therefore that it ought to be guarded by sanctions. But the gentleman has omitted to mention one circumstance, which is, that in England the writ of habeas corpus is secured by the sanction of death. And is our attachment to liberty less than that of England? I say that a Chief Justice of England for refusing to issue a writ of habeas corpus, may be impeached, taken to Tower Hill and decollated. If there had existed the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in England at the time of the impeachment of Strafford, could there have been a charge more strong than a settled design to do away that privilege? In England also it is guarded by the power of attainder. Thank God! we have not that feature in our Constitution. But if the same spirit pervades that country now which once did, nothing would sooner pass a bill of attainder, through the two Houses of Parliament, than a known and wanton invasion of this privilege. But fortunately our Constitution has denied to us this power; and it is because we cannot pass bills of attainder, and because judgments on impeachments do not affect the life, that it behooves us to guard this important principle with some more solemn sanctions than it now possesses.

Mr. Elliot.—A gentleman from Tennessee Mr. G. W. Campbell) whom I do not at this moment observe in his place, but will presume that he is attending his duty as a member of the House, and to attract whose attention I will "lift up my voice," in both of his speeches of yesterday certainly entitled the House to some additional, at least to some explanatory remarks from me; and although the House would be very willing to relinquish its right, I cannot, as an individual member, consent to part with my portion of the claim.

In the first place that gentleman seemed disposed to announce to the House that I was not so well versed in the law of treason as himself. He said that in treason all are principals, and of course that there can be no accessaries. It is very true. The general principle is correct. It has long been settled as a principle of English law, that acts, which, in felony, would make one accessary before the fact, in treason, as well as in trespass, render him a principal offender. But there is a humane and liberal principle in the English law upon this subject, which those exclusive Republicans who are ready to justify General Wilkinson, by considering the persons accused by him guilty of the actual commission of the crime of treason, either do not know, or are not disposed to adopt. The general principle is subject to this qualification, except in treason touching the death of the King, &c. In every other kind of treason, it is admitted that offences of an accessorial nature may exist, and that they are of a derivative character; some act must be done, to which the offender must be accessory, and from which his guilt is derived; some original and principal traitor may exist, to whom another may be considered, in the first instance, as subservient. Although in the event of the prosecution such an offender may be considered as a principal, yet, in his progress towards conviction, which is the case now existing in our own country, he ought, from a principle of natural justice, to be considered merely as in the nature of an accessary, before or after the fact. Otherwise, if the person accused as an auxiliary, were tried before the person who actually committed the act, the very great absurdity and injustice might result, that the accessorial agent might be convicted, and he who did the act, and from whose guilt alone that of the actual accessary could flow, might be acquitted. This principle is to be found in Foster, Hale, and Hawkins, who may be considered as the classical writers upon criminal jurisprudence in Great Britain.

Of the insinuation that I was ignorant of the law, I should, however have had but little reason to complain. I do not recollect that any one adopted the expression, "champion of the Constitution," but myself, and the gentleman spoke of those who announce themselves to the public, as the champions of the Constitution and the cause of liberty, merely for the purpose of making a great noise, and of displaying "pictures," calculated to attract the attention, and delude the imagination, of the people. I will not presume, although I could wish the gentleman were present to give a serious explanation, that he intended to impeach my motives. But something must be said on the subject of pictures and painting. From the extreme difficulty with which the gentlemen managed his metaphor, it was obvious to us all that he was no great proficient in the art. And yet he is unquestionably the very best painter of the particular school to which he happens to belong. There is more animation in his figures, there is more nerve in his attitude, there is more glow in his features, there is more grace even in his coloring, than are to be found in the best productions of his associate artists. We have lately heard and read much of what are called, in the newspaper cant of the day, a republican majority and a republican minority; of republican majority men, and republican minority men. The gentleman, probably, wishes to be considered as the "champion" and leader of the majority, composed of profound statesmen and logicians, while the minority consists of mere painters and declamatory orators. Be it so. Yet I would not insure, at the rate of ten guineas per cent., which we are told is the price of insurance of American property in London, since the publication of the famous imperial decree, the final triumph of the school of logicians over that of painters.

But I did not arrogate to myself, the distinction of a "champion of the Constitution" in the proper sense of the term. It must be within the recollection of all, that I said I was the champion of the Constitution, only as every member of the House was bound by oath to be; its defender against usurpation and unauthorized military power.

Mr. Eppes said, that, when on a former day this resolution had been before the House, he had declared himself in favor of committing it for discussion. Discussion, however, has been had in a different form. The original motion has been withdrawn, and the question is now to be taken on the resolution. He agreed, perfectly, in opinion with the gentleman from Virginia, who had said that a postponement of the resolution was, in substance, a rejection. He should vote for the postponement because he was opposed to the resolution. We have been told by a gentleman from Massachusetts—who, on this occasion, disclaims all party feelings—that the common law of England is not in force in this country; that the statute of Charles II. was not in force in this country; and that, to the penalties of this statute, the English nation owes the security of this privilege. The gentleman has enumerated the penalties of the statute, and asks whether we are less attached to this privilege than the English nation? We are not less attached to the privilege. Our mode of enforcing it is different. In England, if the writ is disobeyed, it can only be enforced by the fines and penalties of the statute of Charles II. In this country, the judge can call in the aid of the nation to enforce the law. In England, the penalties of that statute are necessary to wrest its victims from an Executive armed with prerogative and privilege. In England, the Minister, being a conservator of the peace throughout the Kingdom, may commit in any part of it. In this country, no man can be legally committed, or detained in custody, but by the civil authority. The penalties of the statute of Charles II. never were in force in the Commonwealth of Virginia. The judge is subject, as under the Constitution of the United States, to the action of the party—to impeachment and removal. Mr. E. said he agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts in another point, viz: "That the common law of England 'was not in force in this country, except so far as 'it has been adopted by the Constitution and laws 'of the United States, or of the individual States." He, for one, when brought in jeopardy, would never consent to look for his rights either in the immemorial usage and custom of England or in its statute book. He would appeal to the Constitution and laws of his country, and by them alone would he be tried. If, by them alone, without the aid of the English law, this right was not sufficiently secured to the citizen, he should be willing to make any additional legal provisions that were necessary. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is as well secured as any other right, under the Constitution of the United States. Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of conscience, trial by jury, stand all on the same foundation. The Constitution secures these rights to the citizen, and judges, who ought to be honest, are appointed to protect them. If we are not secure in this right, where, he asked, do gentlemen find the security for any other? Can law render more secure a right derived from the Constitution? Or, can it be necessary to place this right, important as it is, on a different basis from other rights equally dear to the American people, and essential to the existence of a free government? The security for this right is ample, if your judges are honest and independent. The penalties of the statute of Charles II. could only add a pecuniary fine to removal from office; as he apprehended no judge could be suffered to disgrace our bench after being subjected to pecuniary fine for denying to a citizen a Constitutional right which he is sworn to support.

The recent occurrences at Orleans, have been principally relied on to show the necessity of additional provisions for securing this right. Even on this occasion, however, there was no want of power to enforce the writ. The writ was obeyed, the reason of the detention of the persons returned, and the return accepted by the court. He agreed, perfectly, in opinion with the gentleman who thought all the civil officers of the Territory implicated in these transactions. They must certainly have had the same ideas of the public danger with the Commander-in-chief, and either approved of, or connived at the seizure and shipment of these persons. It is impossible that such an act of power could have been exercised in any part of the United States, without the approbation of the civil authority of the State or Territory. The only instance in which the writ of habeas corpus was disobeyed, was at Charleston. In this instance, it is justified by the principle of the gentleman from Virginia.

[Here Mr. J. Randolph interrupted Mr. E., and said he had not justified the act.]

Mr. Eppes continued.—If the gentleman from Virginia will have patience, he will understand correctly how far it is supposed he has justified this refusal of the officer at Charleston. He understood the gentleman from Virginia as saying that an inferior officer was bound to obey his superior. The case of Captain Murray had been cited. In that instance, the law was violated, and Captain Murray reimbursed the damages sustained by him, on the ground of his having obeyed his instructions.

Mr. J. Randolph explained. He said he would ask the gentleman if, because an inferior officer, the commander of a frigate for instance, is justified in obeying the orders of the President touching the construction of an elaborate law, which he can scarcely be presumed capable of expounding, it followed that an inferior officer was to be justified in every possible case, in obeying the orders of a superior commander, from any other motive than that of self-preservation, in which case he ceases to be a rational being? Does he mean to say, that, if the officer of a ship of war, is justifiable in obeying the President in a particular and minor instance, he would be justified in obeying such orders to elevate him to a Dictatorship?

Mr. Eppes, in continuation, observed that he had no wish, and certainly he could have no interest in misstating the ideas of the gentleman from Virginia. He considered the two cases, however, as varying only in this: In the case of Captain Murray, the right of property only had been violated; in the other, the personal right of the citizen. Both acts were illegal. Both were a violation of rights secured by the Constitution and laws. Mr. E., however, thought that gentlemen had mistaken the proposed remedy for such a violation of the right of the citizen. No habeas corpus law could guard against a case where a citizen was kidnapped, and conveyed out of the jurisdiction of a court. A law to operate not on the military only, but on every person who should, without legal authority, arrest, or convey from his residence a citizen of the United States, would be better calculated to embrace such a case. Mr. E. said that, having on a former occasion delivered his sentiments on this subject, he should not again have troubled the House, but from a wish it should be clearly understood that he did not mean to avoid any portion of his responsibility by voting for the postponement instead of a rejection of the resolution.

Mr D. R. Williams called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. J. Clay said, before the question was taken, he would mention one or two points that went to show the necessity of a reference. He understood that one of the persons arrested by General Wilkinson had been landed on an island near Charleston, and, on the issuing a writ, the officer had refused to obey it. He would ask whether this was not a violation of the writ of habeas corpus that required a remedy by law? Mr. C. said he always viewed it as a matter of regret, that questions of this kind should be taken up on party ground. He considered such a suggestion, on the present occasion, as a mere trap to get a few votes. They were told of the dark times when alien and sedition laws were passed. If, however, under the alien law, men might be deported, gentlemen should recollect that it was according to law—that there was an express statute that justified the meaasure. Mr. C. said he considered the kidnapping alluded to by gentlemen as a gross violation of the habeas corpus, and would be glad to know whether sending a man to Baltimore from Orleans, was not as gross a violation of principle as sending him from this place to Orleans? Mr. C. concluded by observing that he considered it a very unfortunate thing for any gentleman of talents to be educated at the bar. So many distinctions were there taken, that a man of his plain mind could scarcely see anything. He should, however, adhere to the Constitution, and would ask whether a military arrest was not a gross violation of it; and whether there ought not to be some exemplary punishment to guard against it?

Mr. Elmer said he should vote for the postponement of the resolution. It had been under discussion for three days, and he did not perceive they were nearer a result than on the first day. Was it discreet to refer this resolution to a select committee, when it was manifest they could not go through the business without neglecting important business already before them? He should also vote for the postponement, as, although three days had been taken up in the discussion, he had not heard any one gentleman urge a single reason to show the necessity of any additional provisions. This very transaction, he believed, would ultimately turn out beneficial to the United States, notwithstanding the arts of ambitious men. It would display such a striking regard of the people to the Government of their choice, as to prevent any like attempts in future. Mr. E. said he did not know whether General Wilkinson was a conspirator, but in this case he did not see that the Constitution had been so flagrantly violated. Take the case of a conspiracy against the Constitution, to level and destroy the Constitution altogether, and directed towards the garrison which General Wilkinson commanded, in a remote part part of the United States, and distant from any strength to support him. If we consider the question in this view, that the lives and property of the citizens were at stake, and even the judges engaged with the conspirators, was it improper to take up these men and send them to a place where they could be impartially tried? Let gentlemen, said Mr. E., pass as sanguinary laws as they please, if I considered the judges concerned, and were satisfied there were conspirators within, I would arrest them, though death were the consequence, and I am persuaded every officer faithful to his trust, would do the same thing. I admit that in all cases, except of the greatest emergency the military ought to give way to the civil power. With regard, however, to what gentlemen call the audacity of sending these people here, in the face of the Legislative body, I confess I entertain a different opinion. In cases of military arrest, I am most afraid of secrecy. Does not publicity, as far as it goes, show a good conscience? Does it not show the wish of the Commander-in chief that his conduct should be examined in the face of the nation, conscious that, on a full examination, he will appear to have acted as a good officer and an honest man? As I have said before, I do not know that he is honest. I know that he has been charged with being a conspirator, but on this point we have no proof before us.

In the circumstances I have mentioned, it would be the duty of a man to violate the law, and, no penalties ought to prevent him. I shall always think it better for one or two men to suffer than the whole nation; and rather to authorize the violation of one part of the Constitution, than permit the whole to be overthrown. Let gentlemen put the case of the judges being concerned in this plot, and of a great army coming down, and the effects which might have flowed from not arresting these men. Could the Commander-in-chief have been justified? If he has excited unnecessary alarm, and arrested individuals on light and improper grounds, let him suffer. In this case it appears that he had the judges on his side. What better could he do to answer the purpose of justice than to send these people to the seat of Government? A circumstance that may turn out highly advantageous to the accused.

Unless this temporary violation of the Constitution be authorized in a case of extreme necessity, the Constitution might be trampled on, and our liberties destroyed; and civil war ensue. Suppose Burr had overcome Wilkinson? What then would have been the avail of your writ of habeas corpus? It would not have been of the least consequence.

Considering all circumstances, I coincide with the gentleman from Virginia in one point. I would make a sweep of all the officers of the Territory of Orleans, so that there should be no difference between the governors and the governed. I believe the disaffection that exists there is confined to a few, who wish to raise a clamor for personal purposes. Still, for the reasons I have mentioned, I would make a general sweep.

Mr. SLOAN.—Nothing but imperious necessity can justify a member rising at so late an hour of the day. I promise the House, however, not to take up much of their time. Allusions and insinuations have been made throughout the whole of his speech by the gentleman from Virginia, against the Commander-in-chief of the army of the United States. He has indeed insinuated a belief that he has been concerned in a treasonable combination for some time past. Admit, for a moment, that this is the case; and then let me ask whether there is not cause to rejoice, that he has in this instance deserted his party; let me ask, if in this case it was not in his power, to have carried on a treasonable conspiracy to the ruin of his country? Again, what use is there in throwing out such aspersions, against a man who is not here to defend himself. The whole subject is reduced to this point. Was there sufficient cause to justify General Wilkinson in the measures taken by him? I deem it my duty to show the House the inconsistency of the gentleman who has thrown out these insinuations. I shall, therefore, from his own speeches, show that he once thought this a matter of considerable magnitude.

Here are the expressions as given by the stenographer.

1st. Speaking of the conduct of Spain—

"It appears indeed that she never has lost sight of this object; and I believe she never will lose sight of it so long as she shall find material to work upon, or a shadow of hope that she will succeed. It appears to me that she has found those materials; that they are of the most dangerous nature: that they are now in operation, and that perhaps, at this moment, while I am addressing you, at least for a time, the fate of the Western country may have been decided."

2d. "Is there a man in this House who at this day doubts, that if the Government—I mean the Executive and Legislature—had taken a manly and decisive attitude towards Spain; and, instead of pen, ink, and paper, had given men and arms; is there a man who disbelieves that not only Spain would have been overawed, but that those domestic traitors would also have been intimidated and overawed, whose plans threaten to be so dangerous!"

3d. "A spectator not in the habit of reading our public prints, or of conversing with individuals out of doors, but who should draw his ideas of the situation of the country from the proceedings of this House during the present session, would be led to infer that there never existed in any nation a greater degree of peace, tranquillity, or union, at home or abroad, than in the United States at this time; and yet what is the fact? That the United States are not only threatened with external war, but with conspiracies and treasons, the more alarming from their not being defined. And yet we sit and adjourn, adjourn and sit, take things as school boys, do as we are bid, and ask no questions."

[Mr. QUINCY asked whether it was proper to read the speeches of a gentleman as given by a stenographer—a member may refer to them on his own recollection.

[The SPEAKER said he was of opinion the gentleman from New Jersey was in order.]

Mr. SLOAN proceeded.

4th. "I again invite the House to draw a proper inference from the indecent, insulting, outrageous demeanor of the Minister of Spain. I did understand that he was to have been deported—shipped off; on the contrary I find him still here; and is not the inference of my friend from Pennsylvania irresistible, that, considering the crowd of memorials presented by him to the Government in the case of Miranda, and that no remonstrance has been made against this pretended expedition against Mexico, that he is acquainted with it; that he knows it is ostensibly for Mexico, but really for Orleans, for the severance of the Union."

5th. "Some gentlemen make extremely light of this conspiracy; I cannot, however, conceive how a man in a state of ignorance respecting its nature or extent can make light of it. The very circumstance of not knowing the extent of danger, has a tendency to magnify it beyond its natural size. But there is one fact, which has come so direct, that it cannot be doubted. I believe it will altogether depend upon the circumstance of the conspirators getting to Baton Rouge before the troops of the United States arrive there, whether New Orleans shall fall; and the waters of the Red river are so low, that we cannot decide when our troops will arrive; they will get possession of the ordnance, and nothing can prevent the reduction of Orleans but a pitched battle."

6th. "If I could triumph at the calamitous situation of my country, there is ample cause indeed for triumph."

7th. "No sir, I cannot take a retrospect of the past without feeling a degree of conscious pride that my aid was not given, that I had no hand in the acts of commission or omission that have brought us to this deplorable state of things."

8th. "I believe the militia as adequate to the protection of New Orleans, as the Cape of Good Hope; and after paying fifteen millions for the Mississippi and its delta, shall we be so penurious as not to defend this important point, this key to our stong box?"

9th. "But I cannot draw so favorable an inference of the public sentiment in any country, when I see a most extraordinary and ramified combination, composed of the most leading characters, and the most flaming patriots too, for the express purpose of severing the Union."

10th. "I do not conceive it to be a thing of yesterday; but an affair of long standing. Look back to the times when the character implicated in this conspiracy first began to move in that country. It was at least contemporaneous with the disappointment of his ambition."

Contrast the foregoing with that member's declaration in the debate upon the suspension of the habeas corpus, wherein he asserted that Burr's conduct did not merit the name of a conspiracy, it was only a trifling intrigue, that might have been suppressed by the militia of a county, and then in his own language let me ask, "Will logic of this kind go down with the House, or the nation?"

Mr. KELLY said the manner in which the subject had been discussed by many gentlemen, could not fail to excite sensations of an unpleasant nature. Observations were made which had no relation to the question, tending only to destroy that harmony and good understanding that ought to prevail among the members of the House. He said he had not been consulted on the propriety of introducing the resolution under consideration, but if he had, it must have met his approbation. As the subject was interesting, and calculated to secure from its importance a full and dispassionate investigation, there was no reasonable ground to conclude that the friends of the measure would be charged with unworthy motives, or that gentlemen would so far forget the dignity of their station as to indulge in invective, tending to destroy that unanimity which the present prospect of public affairs, and the interest of our common country, imperiously required. Mr. K. said, as this mode of treating the subject had been already sufficiently exposed by the gentlemen who had gone before him, he would waive further observations on that score, and proceed to what he considered the real merits of the question then under discussion.

Mr. K. said, from the observations which had been made by many gentlemen, a bystander might conclude that the present was an inquiry into the conduct of General Wilkinson, at New Orleans, and the legality of the arrests which had been made there, as well as into the degree of guilt which attached to the several prisoners.

One gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BIDWELL,) had gone so far as to say it was too late in the session to inquire into the transactions at Orleans, as the evidence could not now be obtained; for his part he left out of consideration everything of this nature as foreign to the subject: the prisoners were to stand trial before a proper tribunal, competent to inquire, and do impartial justice, he would therefore give no opinion respecting their merit or demerit, nor would he undertake to censure or approve of the conduct of the Commander-in-chief, as the circumstances under which he acted were not fully known; and if, on investigation before a proper tribunal, that officer could justify his conduct, and show that the exigency of the times, and the safety of our country demanded the measures he adopted, no man in the House or the community at large would rejoice more than himself at so honorable a result, because he considered it of the utmost importance to the safety of the nation, that those who held high and responsible situations should execute their trusts in a manner so dignified and honorable as to avoid suspicion and command respect. It had been said by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. EPPES,) that the movers of this measure envied the happiness which the people of this country enjoyed, and were sorry that a conspiracy, the ramifications of which were so extensive, was likely to be checked by the vigilance of our Government; he trusted a conduct so profligate could not be ascribed to any gentleman on that floor; for his own part, he said, his conduct and votes bore testimony against so unfounded a charge.

He never counteracted the views of the Executive, by withholding his vote when required, for supplies necessary for carrying into effect the views of the Government. When money for defence or any other purpose had been required by the Executive, it had always the aid of his vote; and he had withheld when the Executive did not recommend.

But is it necessary to inquire whether any provision ought to be made by law to secure the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in cases of arrest under the authority of the United States? One gentleman, from Tennessee (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL) has said, that there is no need of farther provision, and has called on gentlemen to show wherein the existing provisions are defective. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. JACKSON) has said, that it would be narrowing the powers of the court and judges to pass a law on the subject, their powers are so extensive under the Constitution.

In order to obtain a right understanding of the subject, it is necessary to inquire how this inestimable privilege was secured to the subjects of Great Britain by Magna Charta, the great charter of their privileges, which was extorted sword in hand by the Lords and Barons, from King John at Runnymede, and how far the privilege thus secured, was made more effectual by the statute of Charles II., which was called the second great charter of their liberties. This writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, which was secured by this charter, became a writ of right, not less secured to the subjects of that kingdom than the same is secured to our citizens by our Constitution.

We are informed by Sir William Blackstone, in his famous commentaries on the English law, that the inestimable privilege of the writ of habeas corpus was of early date in Great Britain, almost coeval with the first rudiments of their Constitution. The liberty of the subject could not be abridged in any case without special permission of law, although sometimes impaired by the usurpation of princes and the ferocity of particular times. It was, however, established on the firmest basis by the provisions of Magna Charta, and a long succession of statutes under Edward III., and was recognised by the Crown in several after reigns. And it will hardly be contended that this privilege is better secured to the citizens of the United States by our Constitution, than the same was secured to the subjects of the British Crown by the provisions of Magna Charta. Yet abuses had crept into daily practice in England, which had in a great measure defeated this great Constitutional remedy. The flagrant abuse of power by the Crown, generally, produced a struggle which discovered the exercise of that power to be contrary to law, or restrained it for the future. An obscure individual gave birth to the famous habeas corpus act in the reign of Charles II., which was justly called another Magna Charta of the kingdom. Francis Jenkes was committed by the Council Board for a turbulent speech made at a common hall assembled at Guildhall, for the purpose of choosing officers. He applied to the then Lord Chief Justice Kaimsford for a habeas corpus, who alleged that he could not grant the writ in vacation. The friends of the prisoner afterwards applied to the Lord Chancellor, who said the King would not grant it without a petition; application was afterwards made to the court of quarter sessions to have him bailed; the court said, there was no such name in the calender; upon application to the jailor, he said he never returned any man committed by the Council Board. When a copy of the commitment was obtained, the jailor evaded making proof of it by going away, as was believed with the privity of the court; at length the commitment being established, the court doubted their power to act, when the Lord Chief Justice and Lord Chancellor had refused, the court took time to consider of the application until next term. A petition was afterwards presented to the Lord Chancellor, who also took further time to consider; at length the Lord Chief Justice, upon the matter being suggested to the King, issued a habeas corpus, and the prisoner was discharged. To prevent similar abuses in future was the famous habeas corpus act passed, which regulated the mode of proceeding upon writs of habeas corpus, and fully insured its benefits and provisions to the subject.

The several courts were designated, who were authorized and enjoined to issue the writ, and the power extended to certain judges out of term time. The jailor was bound in a given space of time to furnish a copy of the commitment, under penalty; the court, or judge, to make the writ returnable as soon as the distance of the party to be brought up would admit, under severe penalty; provision was made that the party should not be removed from place to place to evade the writ; that he should not be transported, &c. Many provisions were made to insure the full effect of the privilege of the writ, and that the prisoner, on hearing of his case, might be discharged, admitted to bail, or remanded to prison, according to law and the nature of his crime, thereby conforming the proceedings on this writ to the true standard of law and liberty. It has been said on this floor, that the provisions of this statute extend to this country, and the courts are bound to obey them. This doctrine can never be advanced by any gentleman understanding the subject. Some of its provisions may be adopted by practice, but no gentleman will seriously contend that the penalties under that statute would be inflicted here without a positive law to put them in force. If, then, it was necessary, in England, to secure by statute the great Constitutional privilege of the subject against illegal imprisonments at the instance of the Crown, surely, in this land of liberty, the reason holds with equal force; and that a law regulating the proceedings on this writ in courts of the United States is necessary, must strike every mind present with irresistible force, when we see the highest and most respectable tribunal in the United States hearing counsel several days in order to ascertain their powers to issue the writ in the cases now pending before them. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Eppes) says, that the Constitution has secured the right of the writ of habeas corpus, and in the same manner has secured the trial by jury. The gentleman could not have stated a stronger case to prove the necessity of a law to regulate the proceedings under the writ. What good purpose could the guarantee of the trial by jury answer to the citizens of this country if there was no law constituting and organizing courts, and regulating the manner in which the trials shall be had? Without this, the provision in the Constitution would be unavailing, and a dead letter. To designate the courts who shall have power to issue the writ, and clearly to regulate the proceedings thereon and secure its salutary effects, is the object of the present resolution. Under every view of the subject the reasons for a law of the United States securing the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, were strong and unanswerable. He therefore hoped the question would not be postponed, but the subject might go to a select committee, who would have sufficient time to report a bill giving full efficacy to the writ of habeas corpus, in order to secure the liberty of our citizens, and prevent abuse in future.

Mr. J. Randolph.—When you recollect, Mr. Speaker, the seriousness of the charge preferred against me by a member of this House, and the high quarter whence that charge comes, you may, perhaps, wonder at my audacity in daring again to address you. It is, indeed, a charge of a most serious nature; and made, too, by no ordinary person, by a gentleman who acts a most conspicuous part on this floor, a leading member of the majority of the House, and such as really makes me afraid that I shall be considered as pleading guilty, if I say nothing; for how can I venture to go home, and meet my constituents after having been denounced by such high authority. Upon my soul, sir, I am so much affected by the danger of my situation, and the peculiar circumstances of the case, that I can scarcely go on with my remarks. But it is necessary for me to state, not merely for the information of the House, but likewise for the good people of the United States, that against all the reports of the speeches ascribed to me for twelve months passed, I protest. I protest as much against them as against certain other reports of speeches delivered on this floor. On this occasion, as the gentleman has seen fit to read a part of those speeches, I presume they will have the honor of passing to a new edition. But it will be my misfortune that the people who shall read them will not have the advantage of the members of this House; that they will not have a fac simile of their delivery; and that, what they have suffered from the inaccuracy of the reporter will not be made up by the accuracy of their recollection.

[The Reporter would be wanting in that duty which he owes to himself and to truth, not to notice this protest. In his turn, he protests, that so far as respects the reports given by him, they have been invariably impartial, and, as he believes, in all respects substantially correct. In the discharge of this branch of duty, he feels a pride in having, in no instance whatever, felt either personal or party bias, and a high satisfaction in the conviction that every man who knows him will attest the correctness of this declaration. So much for this protest generally. Considered as applicable to the particular speech delivered by Mr. Randolph, and quoted by Mr. Sloan, the Reporter has the same confidence in its correctness as to every important sentiment advanced by the speaker—a confidence, which, if it needed confirmation, has been amply confirmed by the unsolicited assurances of many members of the House of Representatives, of all parties, that it was as accurate a report of a speech as they had ever seen.]

Mr. Newton said, he wished to amend the resolution, by inserting the word "appellate," before the word "power."

The Speaker said, the resolution could not be amended, while a motion for indefinite postponement was depending.

The question on indefinite postponement was then taken by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 60, nays 58, as follows:

Friday, February 20.

Mr. Holmes from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Isaac Briggs; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. Parke presented to the House a petition of sundry inhabitants of the Indiana Territory, which was received and read, praying the division of the said Territory into two separate Governments.—Referred to Mr. Parke, Mr. Varnum, Mr. Alston, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Sandford, Mr. Jeremiah Morrow, and Mr. Philip R. Thompson; to examine and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. Parke presented to the House a petition of sundry inhabitants of Randolph county, in the Indiana Territory, which was received and read, in opposition to a division of the said Territory into two separate governments.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee last appointed.

Mr. Gregg presented to the House a petition of sundry officers who served in the British army, during the war between France and Great Britain, in America, which commenced in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-five, which was received and read, praying to be confirmed in their respective titles to certain lands, granted by the King of Great Britain, in consideration of military services rendered the American Colonies, during the said war.—Referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the third instant, the report of the Committee on the Public Lands on the petition of sundry officers who served in America, during the war between France and Great Britain.

Mr. Roger Nelson, from the committee appointed on the nineteenth instant, presented a bill for the relief of Rinaldo Johnson; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill respecting claims to land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Daniel S. Dexter. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the twenty-first ultimo, to the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia," and agreed to some, and disagreed to others, of the said amendments.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments agreed to, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS,

Ordered, That the second resolution contained in the report of the Committee of the Whole, of the twenty-third ultimo, together with the Message of the President of the United States, of the tenth instant, in relation to the efficacy of gunboats for the defence of harbors, be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the seventh instant, the bill for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States.

A bill received from the Senate to punish frauds committed on the Bank of the United States, was considered in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to. It punishes forgery with confinement to hard labor, not less than three nor more than ten years, or with imprisonment, not more than ten years, and fine not exceeding $5,000. The bill, after being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

A long debate took place, first in Committee of the Whole, and afterwards in the House, on the report of the Committee of Claims on the memorial of Oliver Pollock. The report allows a part of the petitioner's claims. Mr. M. Clay was the principal opponent, and Messrs. TALLMADGE and GREGG the advocates of the report, which was agreed to; ayes 74; and ordered that a bill be prepared by the Committee of Claims.

Mr. NEWTON, from a select committee, reported a bill supplementary to the act on the Navy Peace Establishment. It authorizes the President of the United States to employ an additional number of seamen, should the public exigencies require it. Read twice and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

LEWIS AND CLARKE.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of Monday last, on the bill making compensation to Messrs. Lewis, Clarke, and their companions.

The bill grants land warrants, which may be either located or received at the land offices in payment of debts due there, at the rate of two dollars per acre. The bill grants these persons 24,960 acres.

A motion was made by Mr. LYON to strike out so much as permits the receipt of these warrants at the land offices in payment of debts. This was opposed by Mr. ALSTON and supported by Messrs. TALLMADGE, J. CLAY, QUINCY, COOK, LYON, ELY, and D. R. WILLIAMS. It was contended that double pay was a liberal compensation, and that this grant was extravagant and beyond all former precedent. It was equivalent to taking more than $60,000 out of the Treasury, and might be perhaps three or four times that sum, as the grantees might go over all the Western country and locate their warrants on the best land, in 160 acre lots.

A motion to recommit the bill was made, and, after considerable debate, was carried—ayes 66.

The House proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. JOSEPH CLAY, made yesterday, to add to the standing rules and orders of the House, and made some progress therein: when, an adjournment being called for, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 21.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill respecting claims to land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Daniel S. Dexter was read the third time and passed.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Oliver Pollock; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion depending yesterday at the time of adjournment, to add to the standing rules and orders of the House: Whereupon, the farther consideration of the said motion was postponed indefinitely.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making an appropriation for the further protection of the ports and harbors of the United States.

The first section of the bill appropriates "twenty thousand dollars" to this object.

The sum was struck out.

Mr. COOK moved to fill the blank with the sum of $300,000, and in support of his motion spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: When on a former occasion I proposed to appropriate one million of dollars for the purpose of fortifying the ports and harbors of this nation, my design was to propose a permanent and general appropriation, instead of the temporary annual grants hitherto made, and which are by many considered as little less than a waste of public money; such grants not affording to the engineer the means to perfect a plan of sufficient boldness for our great and rapidly growing nation. Reflection and the discussions in this House have confirmed me in that opinion. I am convinced it would be the most proper mode of conducting a liberal system of defence for our country, and by far more economical than by partial and yearly grants. The probable expense of fortifying the port of New York has been estimated at $320,000; and I ask, sir, if that single object shall consume that sum, will $780,000 be too large a sum to apportion among all our numerous ports from Saint Croix to Saint Mary's, and onward to the southern extremity of our newly acquired territory? Can it be believed that the one-thirteenth part of the annual revenue on impost and tonnage is too heavy a sum to be taken from an overflowing Treasury for the important object of securing for centuries to come our numerous cities containing wealth beyond calculation? Is this sum more than sufficient to afford works of durable materials, and so permanently built as our lasting interest would direct. However, with a view to meet the wishes of other gentlemen, a smaller sum is now proposed, which I hope will prevail.

Sir, in replying to novel opinions, it is not my intent to impeach any gentleman's motives, patriotism, or bravery. I shall impugn arguments and not persons. Indeed, I should think myself guilty of defrauding the nation were I to waste their time in those personalities and unmerited invectives, which are strong points with some gentlemen, and very improperly permitted in this House. To induce this House to apply but a small annual sum for the object before us, we have heard it predicated of fortifications, that they are worse than useless; and of cities, that they are untenable and unworthy of defence. Were it not intuitively seen that cities are defensible and worthy of such defence, the doubting, if they be not reason-proof, may be syllogistically convinced.

Thus we might say, what costs most labor is most valuable; cities cost most labor, therefore are cities most valuable. What is most valuable is most worthy of defence. Cities are most valuable, therefore are cities most worthy of defence. But not to go farther into proving self-evident positions, who can be silent when measures of injustice, degradation, and extreme calamity, are thus recommended for our adoption? Are not the minds of the just, the liberal, and the brave, revolted at the measures proposed? Is not this doctrine of runawayism abhorrent to all our just and social feelings, and to those inestimable feelings which gave us the country we are bound to defend? A new and untried mode of warfare is now urged upon us—a plan no less divergent from reason or plausibility of result than it is from example or experience. Sir, I do not feel disposed that we should risk our all on a project so unpromising. It might suit a savage or an extremely barbarous nation, and would readily be adopted as statute law in Hayti. But Heaven forbid it should ever find advocates in this or any other polished or civilized nation.

Surely it would require the eloquence of a Curran to present you a picturesque and glowing description of all the horrors consequent upon an assailing foe on a defenceless, populous, and devoted city. The mind is painfully affected with the bare imagination of a retreating multitude of ruined forlorn fugitives, despoiled of all the fond objects which has fastened them to life—a countless number of every age, sex, and condition, interspersed with the lame, blind, halt, and withered, crowding to the country so numerously that the very ground might be supposed to groan beneath the weight, and rebuke the folly and madness of the despairing multitude. This monstrous doctrine of abandoning cities, navies, gunboats, and millions, to sack, pillage, and conflagration, at the mere sight of an enemy, and of retreating to forests, to dens, to caverns of the earth, is unwarranted by examples in the ancient, dark, or modern ages. Indeed, sir, with the ancients, the city was the sine qua non of national existence. When Troy fell we hear no more of the Trojans, and the Carthegenians lost their name under the ruins of their city. In those days each city was defended as a Thermopylæ. Modern tactics support a doctrine equally brave and politic—hence the propriety, even under our late Fabian commander, of the battles of Brandywine and Charlestown. Nor has Great Britain, although surrounded by floating castles, omitted strongly to fortify against a threatened invasion.

Mr. Chairman, if the slaves of a despot, or the subjects of a King, compelled to fight for rights not their own; if they defend the abattis of their forts, and bravely meet their foes at the parapet, shall we less valorously protect our dwellings, our property, our families, and our holy and sacred right of self-government? Justly to appreciate our happy Government, we should consider it what indeed I think it is, the only solitary one on earth, founded on the will and interest of the governed. For all others, either in a greater or lesser degree, partake of force, fraud, or superstition. We are also acting as proxies for posterity, and on us are fixed the eyes and the hopes of the friends of long insulted humanity. Shall we not act unwisely in the extreme if we lose our treasure, permit our strong boxes to be rifled, the emporiums of our wealth invaded, by withholding the trivial expense of a lock? None can deny, I think, that by such timid parsimony, we may be suddenly and easily subdued by a conqueror, whose fancy may lead him to act like Charles XII., and send his boot as his deputy to rule the conscript fathers of this land.

I conceive it to be as conformable to the dictates of interest and policy, as it is to those of justice and socialness, that the enemy should be met at the water's edge, and will not gentlemen from the interior consider that the scene of pillage and war would be thus, happily for them, far removed from their peaceful mansions and possessions? Should a different mode of resistance be adopted, what sum of money is proposed for erecting asylums in the internal country; and what positions are to be selected for a retreating multitude? Immense sums would be expended—labyrinths as extensive as that of Egypt will be found necessary to hide all but your active warriors. Such retreats would be found to be indispensable—your hospitality would soon be exhausted—added to which consideration, the fugitives would be dolesome companions to the projectors of wretchedness and misery.

As I verily believe that a defenceless state necessarily leads to a subjugated state, a sense of duty which I owe to myself, to my country, and to futurity, obliges me to expose the fallacy of such dangerous propositions. I do most seriously and heartily detest and abhor royalty, and the doctrine of the many made for the few, or the many made for one. It is for this cause that I would defend our republican rights against any and every assailant. Profuse expenditures, which generate heavy burdens on the people, are ever to be avoided; but is it not possible to verge to the opposite, though equally dangerous extreme? We should carefully shun the rock Scylla, but should we less cautiously avoid the vortex of Charybdis?

Sir, forms of government, like every other human production, are imperfect. Perhaps the only weak part of democratic government is its liability to factions and extreme changes; hence we find in such governments flaming and restless zealots, who, from system, make opposition to every measure their opponents may approve. The Roman Generals adopted a different policy. The errors of the past Administration may lead us to others opposite indeed, but not less dangerous, as one extreme is too often succeeded by another.

But of gentlemen who are willing to look arguments in the face, and fairly meet them, I will ask, whether justice, good faith, or honesty, will permit them in these belligerent times to suffer our ports and harbors to remain defenceless? Justice is a cardinal virtue, and the only basis of all good government; and every Government not thus founded, is from its nature evanescent, or evidently fleeting. Sir, I will ask, if any be hardy enough to claim allegiance, and at the same time refuse protection? Will you issue decrees of disfranchisement and excommunication? Will you put citizens at the ban of the empire, and still claim of them obedience and revenue? If you should act thus unjustly, will you not drive the oppressed into rebellion? Will they not be justified in following the example of the ancient Thessalians, a people inhabiting a frontier State of Greece, who, when threatened with a Persian invasion, asked that their country should be fortified, and who, being refused, joined the invaders to subdue their own countrymen. It is an incontrovertible fact, that the minority have their rights; this will eternally remain a fact so long as force and justice are distinct. The agricultural representation is, and will remain, more numerous than that from the cities. Our interests are one, united and indivisible; and even were they not thus inseparably united, the genius of our Government forbids unequal rights. Sir, it is for the sake of safety, justice, and protection, that we associate in government—deny and refuse this, and all the uses of Government are at an end. The cities have their claims; the merchant and mariner have their rights, which we as legislators have sworn to defend, because we have sworn to support the Constitution, and that Constitution makes it our bounden duty to provide for the common defence and general warfare. Many merchants are opposed to the Administration; is it because they are not generally republicans? I hope not. Many of them, perhaps, look too singly to their own interests, and because Government does not do everything for their protection, therefore they do nothing. If they ask too much, perhaps we are willing to grant them too little.

Sir, every species of government, of whatever name, which shall not equally protect every single individual of the nation in his civil and political rights is a tyranny, and as such to be deprecated and opposed.

"Not even the anointed hand of Heaven
Can authorize oppression, give a law
For lawless power, wed faith to violation,
On reason build misrule, or justly bind Allegiance to injustice. Tyranny absolves all faith."

I lament that the mutualities of the different parts of this one great whole are so little attended to; that localities so much prevail over our minds. Do we to spectators appear in the sublime character of National Representatives, or do we not rather too often appear as State, district, and even parish champions? I cannot but hope yet to see the proud day when we shall become truly national; when the whole country shall appear to each as one common and equal object of attention and care; when we shall view the whole as joint stock, and as such repel every violation.

Crowned heads must be inimical to the success of our experiment of self-government, as its success goes to hurt their selfish trade of self-governing. Their forbearance is therefore uncertain and precarious, and we should be constantly ready to repel. Should they be permitted peaceably to land their hosts of veterans, used only to the bayonet, I fear our militia would want time for seasoning, for they are not all equal to those of the division of my honorable colleague on my left; many are sadly armed and poorly equipped; in such an event a war of posts would be our only safety. Thus, sir, to a country defended by militia, fortifications are indispensable. I ask, sir, of military men who served in our Revolutionary war, could we without fortifications, now so decried, have succeeded in that war?

As a sedative we are constantly assailed with the cry of too soon, or too late, too much, or too little. Are we not immediately threatened; we are asked, why prepare? it is too soon. Are we actually threatened, insulted, and despoiled; then we are told it is quite too late, and we have no time to prepare. Is a liberal sum proposed, that is ruinous; is a small one named, it will be utterly useless. Thus I fear we shall be hushed to sleep on the verge of a precipice. To avert the evils of war, let us wisely be prepared to meet them. I trust we shall yet, by such preparation, deter all aggressors, and by our justice and bravery, inscribe our freedom on the most lasting records of Time.

Mr. Ely regretted that there was so great an unwillingness in the House to attend to the subject of fortifications and to the national defence. He lived himself in a district well protected from all attacks by land or sea, and thickly settled by able defenders of the country. It had been selected, on account of its safety, as a proper position for a public arsenal. No man was better secured than he and his constituents; and he believed that no army, let them land where they would, could penetrate to them. But was that a reason why he ought to be careless of the safety of his neighbors, and of those who might be exposed in distant parts of the Union? Mr. E. asked if other gentlemen, who felt themselves secure, would, for that reason, neglect to provide a defence for those who were more exposed.

It had been repeatedly said, that there is no imminent danger. But it is a fundamental principle of good policy to prepare for danger when we can. It is unsafe to wait until its actual approach.

In reply to the objection that much money had been already laid out on fortifications and done no good, Mr. E. said, he had seen some of the works, and found the money well laid out, as far as it went. Let gentlemen go to Boston, and they will find it had done essential service, and in a great measure secured the place from danger.

It has been said, that fortifications cannot defend a town against a large fleet. A fleet might go into Boston harbor, with proper wind and tide; but a little more expense would render their situation so uncomfortable as to repel every idea of their coming in, since it is so extremely difficult to get out again.

Mr. E. stated at length his objections to partial and specific appropriations. He was willing to defend New York; but he thought all distinctions odious, and that the responsibility of applying whatever was voted for the purpose should rest on the President.

Mr. E. believed that the nation, after no great lapse of time, would have to defend herself against oppression. Defenceless nations invite aggression. We are wealthy. If two ships of war can come and take three or four millions from the banks of New York, it would be found very convenient in the ways and means of any nation.

It has been said that New York cannot be defended; but suitable batteries and a few frigates can certainly repel marauders. It is constantly said that ships may go into the harbor with a favorable wind and tide. Was there ever a harbor which they could not enter? But what object can they have in going if they are to get only hard knocks? They will not venture in if they anticipate a rough reception. Because a place cannot be rendered absolutely impregnable, it is not reasonable hence to contend that nothing shall be done towards its protection.

Mr. Chandler opposed the motion, being, as he said, against all useless appropriations. He thought $20,000 the proper sum, and was sorry the House had been induced by the eloquence of his colleague, to strike it out. The select committee, after a full examination, recommended this sum as adequate.

If the people of New York have all the fears they profess, why have they not long ago ceded the jurisdiction of the proper sites? They had not done it till lately. This does not look like being so fearful and apprehensive.

The Government had communicated their plan of defence by batteries and gunboats, and why the House had been led away from it, Mr. C. could not imagine. He was against any sum larger than $20,000.

Mr. Holland declared that, if he thought fortifications would do the Government any good, he should be in favor of them; but, from the view which he had been able to take, he believed the country was now worse off than if there were no fortifications at all. If the seaport towns were fortified, and we had a small fleet, we should certainly go to war; for there is a great propensity in us to go to war against other nations, much more than in them to go to war against us. The majority of the people do not wish for war, but many, who want to get rich fast, are always wanting to go to war. I believe the state of the fortifications is fully sufficient, and that were they in a different state, war would be involved in this country. Had we the means of carrying on a war, the treasures of our neighbors, the Spanish settlements, would be an inducement to commence hostilities; they would be certainly come at by enterprising geniuses.

If New York and our other cities were only tolerably fortified, Mr. H. was confident that we should go to war. He lamented the consequences of that disposition that is for novelty in this country, a disposition that cannot be quelled. Our commercial towns are defenceless, and that is our only safety at present. I want to see not a single ship or any preparation for war. No nation is disposed to go to war with us, though other nations have borne much more insults from us than we from them.

If we had had a few ships-of-the-line, we should have been at war before now. The greatest danger we have to guard against is from ourselves, from our restless disposition. There is no danger to us from any of the nations of Europe. We are too independent, and were it not for the weakness of our cities, it would be impossible to keep out of war. Mr. H. would not vote a single cent for fortifications or a navy.

There had been a great cry of French spoliations, but when an adjustment came, they made restitution where they had violated the laws of nations. Mr. H. concluded with saying that he was wholly opposed to filling up the sum with $300,000.

Mr. Dana.—From some of the observations of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Holland,) he seems to fear that fortifications on the coast will enlist the United States in a war, almost as much as the boor, in the Recruiting Officer, feared that a piece of money would enlist him in the army. Does the gentleman rate the intellects of this House so low as to imagine they will believe in the reality of any such danger? Principles of public law authorize us to establish fortifications for the protection of our maritime frontier. The whole space within the range of cannon shot from the shore, is most clearly within our territorial jurisdiction; and the efficacious maintenance of this jurisdiction is no breach of any of the duties of neutrality. Every person acquainted with the acknowledged law of nations, must know this.

It is needless to vindicate the United States from his charges, which represent us as being aggressors in the controversies with foreign Powers. Whatever other charges might be made, one thing is certain—the political sin of this country is not a disposition to war. Away with such objections.

I will not degrade my friends nor myself by a formal answer to certain observations which have been made, to excite prejudices against us. With respect to those who indulge themselves in such observations, what pretensions have they to arrogate a superiority over other members of this House? Do they claim the prerogative of controlling the freedom of our deliberations? Would they disfranchise a part of the Representatives who have been chosen by the people as fairly and as freely as they have been? Or will they refuse to adopt measures of public utility, because not proposed by themselves?

I wish systematic provision to be made for the safety of the United States; not that the country should engage in war. Let my country live in peace, without coveting military glory! but let this peace be consistent with safety, and free from infamy!

Yet I propose nothing to require additional taxation—nothing to require any new debt to be incurred; nothing to embarrass the operations of the Treasury; nothing to impair any of the public establishments; nothing to check the reduction of the public debt; nothing to require any abolition of offices, or any diminution of salaries; nothing to interfere with any authorized project of internal improvement or discovery. Your whole civil list may remain untouched. You may indulge a disposition for speculations with respect to the interior of the country, and make liberal allowance for experiments. In addition to the official estimates for contingencies, and for all ordinary expenditures, you may reserve, if you will, half a million of dollars to be wasted at pleasure! After drawing from the Treasury an ample sum for all such expenses, let the surplus be applied to the great purpose of national preservation.

I could wish a larger sum, than is now in question, to be appropriated for the fortifying of our ports and harbors. I wish not merely an appropriation to repair such works as have been constructed and left to decay, but an appropriation made with a view to constructing durable works, in pursuance of a well arranged system of defence. A liberal appropriation for the current year, half a million or a million of dollars, would announce to the President of the United States the scale upon which the plan of fortifications ought to be undertaken. In this case the foundation might be well laid for permanent means of defence; and corresponident appropriations to be subsequently made, would provide for the regular completion of the system.

If there be only a small sum appropriated, the works may not be well commenced, or, perhaps, nothing will be done for any of the Atlantic States, except making some repairs. Would this be due to them? If a liberal appropriation be made, and should not all be wanted within the year, still it will be attended with the advantage of assuring to the Executive the command of means for permanent fortifications, and the money may be drawn from the Treasury, according to circumstances, in the course of a subsequent year.

More than half a million of dollars might now be granted for fortifications, without any financial impediments. The Secretary's report on the finances estimates the revenue from the customs at thirteen millions of dollars for the year. He informs us, indeed, that the product for the first three quarters of the year 1806, has exceeded that of the correspondent quarters in the year 1805, but has not mentioned the amount of this excess. At what sum ought it to be stated? Let gentlemen conjecture, for a moment! Do they suppose it to be a million of dollars? It is not relied on as an item in the Treasury estimates. Yet it presents a fund for a liberal appropriation. From a comparison of other official documents with the reports on the finances, I can now state with undoubting assurance, that the excess, to which the Secretary had referred in general terms, amounts to more than a million and a quarter of dollars.*

This is for the three first quarters of the year: and from the relative amount of importations, it may be confidently expected, that the last quarter of the year will exhibit a correspondent increase of revenue. All this excess, which cannot be less than a million and an half for the whole year, may be taken from the Treasury, without encroaching on any existing appropriation. It might all be granted for fortifications, without deranging any operations of the Government. This sum is free for your disposal, as a clear overplus, beyond all the official estimates.

I now ask that some portion of this overplus may be appropriated for the protection of our ports and harbors: I am not willing to abandon the whole Atlantic frontier to the generosity of foreign aggressors. I would not encourage them to expect plunder without blood.

Much has been said about the Louisiana purchase. It has been the topic of popular harangues; and various opinions have been advanced with respect to such an extension of territory. Yet the great object, perhaps the only object, for which such a purchase ought to be valued by the people of the United States, is the security of the free navigation of the Mississippi, and other waters as relative to the commerce of the Western country. Among those who understand the full value of that navigation, I recollect no person who has objected merely to the price. Objections were made for other causes—questions respecting title and boundaries, stipulations which might lead to foreign interference, and stipulations which were deemed unconstitutional. Such objections were collateral to the main object which I have mentioned, and were founded on the exceptionable terms of the instrument of cession, not on the price to be given for securing the freedom of the Western commerce.

That price was fifteen millions of dollars. So much has been granted on account of the Western country. It is equivalent to a perpetual annuity of nine hundred thousand dollars. So much is applicable to the protection of that portion of the United States—nine hundred thousand dollars every year forever.

After so large an appropriation for the more immediate interest of the Western country, why not grant something effectual for the Atlantic States? Yet I make no claims on the gratitude of our fellow-citizens of the West. The great expense for security against foreign aggressions must have relation to the frontiers; and although the inhabitants in the vicinity may be more immediately benefitted, yet the nation has a general interest in the security of all the inhabitants.

When you are solicited to provide for the security of the Atlantic frontier, can you condemn the measure as unreasonable? Where is the greatest body of population? Where is the greatest mass of wealth? And where do you collect your principal revenue?

Notwithstanding these strong claims of the Atlantic States, the amount now desired for them is not so much as has been granted for the Western country. Besides the perpetual annuity of nine hundred thousand dollars, recollect the annual expenditures for the army! For the theatre of their service look to the West!

With the grant equivalent to $900,000 annually forever to secure the frontier on the West, and with the maintenance of the regular forces for protection in that quarter, would it seem more than just to grant an equal sum for protecting the frontier on the Atlantic? Yet it is not half that sum which is now in debate; it is but one third of the sum for one year.

I enter into no details, I offer no plan, for the fortification of any of our ports. I do not profess myself to be an engineer. The art of constructing works for attack or defence is so peculiarly a distinct province, that some of the most eminent military commanders have deemed it proper in this respect to rely on their engineers, rather than on themselves. If a plan for the regular fortification of any four principal ports were now submitted to the House, would the majority understand the terms of art to be used in explaining it?

Various observations have been made relative to the impracticability of fortifying New York, so as completely to secure it against capture. That such a place as New York might ultimately be taken by an enemy, is not denied. In process of time, any fortified place might be taken, if invested by superior forces, and left without succors.

Shall, it, therefore, be said, that fortifications are useless? Security against predatory excursions; the powerful resistance which a small body of men may oppose to the more regular efforts of an invading enemy; the embarrassment of his operations; the waste and discouragement of his forces; the gaining time to collect strength for meeting him in the field—these are among the advantages. To fortify New York, so as to withstand a powerful enemy for a long time, may be difficult. But is it impossible?

The duties assigned to this House do not require the members to be engineers competent to decide such questions. If we appropriate the proper sums for the defence of our ports and harbors, professional men, whose duty it is to understand such subjects, may be directed to make the requisite examinations and surveys, and report such plans of defence as may be judged useful. If, on investigation, they should condemn the project of fortifying any particular place, we may be confident that the President of the United States would not order it fortified; and the money would of course remain to be applied to other uses.

If we are not to have any fortifications, because it might be possible for an enemy to take them, what will gentlemen say with respect to other means of defence? Army, navy, militia, all are liable to disasters. When will you give battle to invaders of the country, if you wait for absolute assurance of victory? Would you reproach those who fought at Bunker's Hill, because they were ultimately compelled to retire from the works?

The subject presents a great public question. Will you abandon the country near the Atlantic to pillage and desolation, or will you authorize a regular system of defence?

With a Treasury full to overflowing, you are now called upon to appropriate a part of the excess of your revenue for protecting this important portion of our country. Let the moneys be applied regularly, from time to time, as the Treasury will allow, until the system shall be completed. Such a plan requires no exhausting of your resources; no present augmentation of the army; no loan; no new debt.

In forming an opinion relative to fortifications for the Atlantic frontier, I deem it unnecessary to enter into an examination of the various circumstances attending our foreign relations at the present moment. To-morrow there may be a change. To decide the question now before us, we need not inquire, in detail, what has been effected by the extraordinary missions from this country to Europe, with respect to subjects which occupied so much of your deliberations at the last session—whether a satisfactory treaty has or has not been negotiated with one of the European Powers? whether the negotiations with other Powers are nearly closed, or are still to be protracted amidst multiplied embarrassments and vexations? These would be but partial views of the general subject. It is a permanent system for the common defence, which I wish to have adopted from a regard to the great principles of public security.

On this subject, I do not say that the United States are in immediate danger from any one of the European Powers; I make no attempt to alarm you by any such declaration. But there are general considerations which are highly interesting to this country. Some of them I will now mention very concisely.

Events in Europe proclaim one broad fact—the wish for peace is not a security against war.

Of the States called Republics, in ancient or modern times, all have lost their independence or ceased to exist, except the United States of America. As exhibiting to mankind one example of Republican Government, we now stand alone on the globe, surrounded by ruins.

Our system of policy excludes all hereditary distinctions of rank, title, or power. Can such an experiment, on a scale so extensive as ours, be grateful to possessors of monarchical prerogatives? If we expect no congeniality of sentiment from any of the hereditary Governments founded on the ancient feudal system of Europe, what ought we to expect from a recent Government, exhibiting a new system of hereditary distinctions, analogous to the feudal policy, and erected on feudal and democratic ruins? While our example is viewed with a jealous eye, if we appear contemptible as to defence, the expected facility of success will be an additional incentive to hostility.

If our course of policy should exhibit an elective Government cherishing peace, but wise and strong to protect all in the fair enjoyment of the fruits of industry, we shall present to mankind an example worthy to be respected, and may confide in the general approbation of our fellow-citizens.

I will not so far dishonor my country as to suppose that any member of this House can, for a moment, admit the idea of bowing our free necks to a foreign yoke.

Mr. Newton spoke in favor of a liberal appropriation but without pledging himself to the sum which had been moved. He thought the subject all-important, and it was his decided policy to be liberal on the score of national defence. Will you, said he, abandon the seashore? If you protect the coast you at the same time protect the interior. Their interests are the same.

Mr. N. had opposed the specific grant to fortify New York, because he was against every species of favoritism on the subject of national defence. He would be liberal to all. Why did not the members from New York look to us at the South before, and consider our defenceless situation, as well as theirs? When they had awakened from their lethargy, they attempted to enlist us in their plan, by proposing some of our ports, (Charleston and Norfolk.) We resisted such a proposition. I wish for no favoritism to our part of the country.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. Holland) has delivered an elaborate argument against fortifications, and says that they will create national pride and lead to war. We ask for fortifications only to protect us against marauders. He cannot suppose that we intend to launch into the ocean and privateer with them. This would be something new.

If we advert to history, we shall find that, in consequence of fortifications, the violence of rapine has been stayed, campaigns lost, and countries protected from desolation.

Mr. N. was in favor of a liberal and general appropriation on another ground. The Executive is the proper department to receive details of fortifications, and can judge concerning them, and apply the money where it will be the most advantageous.

The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. Dana) has turned our attention to the Western people, and given an account of the vast sums of money expended for their benefit. Mr. N. did not wish to make an interested appeal to the members from that quarter; he hoped they would approve the defence of the coast from the dictates of reason. He had been in favor of the purchase of Louisiana, and he thanked God that his name was on record as the friend of that measure. Our interests and those of the Western people are inseparable, and he hoped they would consider our situation. The day will come, I predict it, when the interests of the West and the Atlantic States will not militate; I hope they do not now. When the Atlantic States are distressed, the Gulf of Mexico will be in the like predicament, and the mouth of the Mississippi will be blocked up.

Mr. Holland explained. He said the merchants of New York had fitted out vessels to St. Domingo, and compelled Congress to make a law prohibiting the trade. They had done more. They had suffered the Leander to be fitted out for an attack on a foreign Power at peace with us, when they might have prevented it. If they go to such length when they are in a defenceless situation, what would they do if they were fortified? If we once engage in war by the misconduct of such men, we should defend them, as Hector defended Troy against the Greeks, though he reprobated the cause of the war. New York has done enough to show that they feel secure. The people there might have prevented many improper things.

Mr. Cook said he was happy that the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Holland) had given the House such long, learned, and logical speeches. He hoped all the arguments had now been brought up on that side of the question, and it would not be very difficult to answer them. Mr. C. was surprised to hear all the people of New York charged with the acts of a few. This was new doctrine. The gentleman reprobates all preparations for war. We must then disband the militia, lest they should provoke a war. Our navy and gunboats are all useless, nay worse than useless, for they may provoke a war.

Mr. C. hoped there was no prejudice in the House against merchants. It was true that a considerable part of them are opposed to the present Administration, but he supposed it was because they thought they were not sufficiently protected by the Government, and that the present Administration was hostile to their interests. Mr. C. was not the apologist of such men. He was himself a friend to the present Administration, because he thought it better than the past. We have mended, but we are not perfect: I would not reject all measures proposed, because they were adopted by the last Administration.

Mr. Elmer spoke at length in favor of $20,000.

Mr. Fisk wished to know what republics had ever perished for want of fortifications and a navy? The Government has already laid out large sums for the merchants, in negotiating treaties, supporting ambassadors and consuls, &c. He was against fortifications for the very reasons urged in their favor. If New York is the object, why not say so? It is said we have a law mentioning eighteen ports. This is specific, and why not therefore repeal this law and let all the whole coast from Florida to Machias be fortified? It is said the responsibility is with the President. If a particular port is not protected, the fault will then be all charged to him, and a great outcry made. I am therefore opposed to the motion.

Mr. Dana.—It is true that I am against a partial appropriation for New York—not that I am against fortifying that port, but because I do not wish the interest of New York to be detached from the common interest of the Atlantic States. The defence of our ports and harbors is a great public concern, respecting which I would legislate on public principles. Other ports besides New York have claims to protection; and shall they be all abandoned, and New York exclusively regarded? I would make a general provision for fortifications, which might be applied to the respective ports and harbors according to their situations, and relative importance. Among those which are important, I regard New York as preeminent. But although it is the right arm of our defence, it is not the whole body.

If any gentlemen suppose the idea of fortifying New York to be a project for inflaming the local politics of the State, if they suppose that any of the propositions which have been moved and supported in this House have been made with a view to the local elections, this is not a procedure for which I am responsible. I have entered into no league with either of the contending sections of the ruling party in New York. Among the political leaders of different descriptions in that State, are to be found men of talents, entitled to my personal respect. Their good sense, I am confident, will not permit them to believe that their great purpose is to be secured by any petty appropriation for the port of New York. They have an interest in common with others. Where is the propriety of their separation from the common use?

When the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Fisk) talks about fortifying the whole coast, from East Florida to Machias, what idea has he of fortifications? If he means the erecting of batteries everywhere, along the whole extent of the coast, does he know anything about the subject?

In the case where an extensive frontier is to be protected, one of the first principles of defence is to provide for securing the most important positions. No man who understands the subject would seriously propose to construct works at every place, however insignificant. Effectual provision for the principal places is what is desired. The command of them is a security for the rest.

If it be asked, what places on the Atlantic frontier are of most importance with respect to the common defence, an attention to the history of our Revolutionary war might assist gentlemen in deciding the question.

The port of Boston, which was occupied at the commencement of hostilities, was abandoned by the British early in the next year. It was not a convenient position for the enemy.

In the same year, after the abandonment of Boston, the British seized the port of New York. This was of such importance as a military and naval station, it was so favorable to their various enterprises, it enabled them so extensively to annoy the country and intercept the interior communications, while it was attended with peculiar advantages for maritime warfare, that they continued to occupy it during all the subsequent years of the war. The fact is decisive with respect to the superior importance of New York. Philadelphia was the main object of a campaign, but was abandoned the year after it was taken.

The conduct of the enemy proved the importance which they attached to Norfolk in Virginia. Charleston, in South Carolina, was judged worthy of a long siege, and from its relative situation, and the advantages of water communication with other places, must be deemed of peculiar importance. The seizure and occupation of Savannah, in Georgia, have proved the attention due to that place. There are other ports of no inconsiderable moment. It is needless to mention all which have been designated by law. Proportionate attention is due to each of them.

It is proper for us to grant moneys for the general purpose of fortifications; and the greatest proportion may be applied where it will be most useful. It is for professional men to give opinions on such questions, and the President of the United States may then decide. He may require information from the proper officers, will have at command better means of knowledge than the members of this House, and can more properly direct the detailed execution of the system. To him, as commander-in-chief of the public force, it peculiarly belongs to direct the particular application of such general means of defence as may be provided by the Legislature.

Mr. Newton had omitted one idea before. In time of war the communication between different parts of the country must be by inland navigation, as we have no navy adequate to the protection of trade coastwise. Canals are now cutting between Norfolk and Albemarle Sound, and between North and South Carolina. If Norfolk then should be taken, it would interrupt all water communication between the Middle and Southern States.

Mr. Cook was about rising again, when

Mr. Smilie rose: As he saw gentlemen getting up the third time, he would remark that there was much business on the table, and that only eight days was now left to do it in. He hoped gentlemen would therefore shorten their speeches as much as possible. He believed every member was ready to vote. Mr. S. proceeded at some length to insist on the value of time and the necessity of being brief.

After some animadversions from Mr. Cook on the remarks of Mr. Smilie, the question on Mr.

C.'s motion to appropriate $300,000 for fortications was taken and lost, 44 yeas to 57 nays.

Mr. Newton proposed $150,000.

Mr. Masters proposed $200,000. The motion of Mr. M. was lost, yeas 46.

Mr. Smilie proposed $100,000. Since the New York gentlemen say gunboats will not do there, I am willing to let them have so much for fortifications, seeing it will not increase the whole expense.

The question on Mr. Newton's motion to insert $150,000 was taken and carried, yeas 56, nays 47.

The Committee had now gone through the bill.

Mr. Thomas proposed an additional section to appropriate a sum for gunboats.

Mr. Quincy observed that if the gentleman who made this motion had not been from New York he should have supposed that he intended to defeat the bill, for it was well known that many friends to fortifications were decidedly against building any more gunboats.

Mr. D. R. Williams expressed his hostility to the motion. We have already gunboats enough for use in those places where they are useful. Some gentlemen were disposed to make fun of gunboats, but they originated in federal times and those first built were indeed curious creatures. They were a sort of amphibious animal; they were a perfect nondescript, and formed a new era in naval architecture. They had two heads, two keels, and never a stern. We have made some improvements, and I hope we shall make more.

Mr. Cook was glad to hear that gunboats had a federal birth.

Mr. Quincy said he believed gunboats originated in federal times, and everything else that related to the defence of the country. He had heard of nothing new under the present Administration. Gunboats were useful in some places, but the ridicule had been cast upon them because they had taken place of everything else, and were considered as a substitute for all other means of defence.

Mr. Alston agreed that the present Administration had taken up a new system of defence. It was that of saving the public money. This system was new, and not known in federal times. We had not gone on increasing taxes like our predecessors.

Mr. Quincy replied that the Federal Administration had saved the country from danger and disgrace. He wished he could say as much of their successors.

Mr. Smilie asked if they had not defended the country. He would ask, also, if all the fortifications ever built were worth the pen in his hand?

Mr. Gregg thought gentlemen were engaged in a curious debate. It seemed as if those on one side had got into fortifications, while those on the other were coming in gunboats to attack them. Mr. G. could see no prospect of danger, and he wondered why so much ado was made about the subject. He was, however, willing to vote for the sum which had been agreed to, so that gentlemen might enjoy repose when they went to bed.

The section for gunboats was then agreed to—53 yeas, 34 nays.

Two blanks remained to be filled—first, the amount of the appropriation, and secondly, the number of boats.

On motion of Mr. Early the first blank was filled with 150,000; and on motion of Mr. Thomas the second was filled with 30, so that $150,000 were appropriated to build thirty gunboats.

The Committee rose and reported the bill as amended to the House, who immediately adjourned, ayes 56, nays 44, without taking any question on the report.

Monday, February 23.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a list of invalid pensioners placed on the pension list of the respective States, in obedience to a resolution of the House of the seventeenth April, one thousand eight hundred and six; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act regulating the granting of registers in case of ships and vessels of the United States becoming the property of bank and insurance companies;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed the bill sent from this House, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a further time, an act, entitled 'An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain parts of the Island of St Domingo," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House; also, the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the office of the Secretary of the Department of War," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating the granting of registers in case of ships and vessels of the United States becoming the property of bank and insurance companies," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a further time, an act, entitled 'An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain parts of the island of St. Domingo:" Whereupon.

Resolved, That this House do agree to the said amendments.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to the act entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act making provision for the redemption of the public debt of the United States.

A motion was made to strike out the first section, which is as follows:

Sec. 1. Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That if any part of the present three per cent. stock of the United States shall remain unsubscribed to the loan constituted by the act to which this is an addition, the said unsubscribed stock shall be paid and reimbursed by payments, on account both of principal and interest, at the rate of four per centum a year, upon the original capital of the said stock, until the whole of the said stock shall have been reimbursed and paid: and the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund are hereby authorized and required to make the said payments by dividends, at the rate of one per centum on the original capital, payable on the last day of March, June, September, and December, of each year, after the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, until the reimbursement shall have been effected.

This motion was supported by Messrs Tallmadge and Quincy; and opposed by Messrs. J. Randolph, and Bidwell; and disagreed to—ayes 6; when the Committee rose, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill relative to fortifications and gunboats. The Committee reported an appropriation of 150,000 dollars, to fortify the harbors of the United States, and the like sum to build thirty gunboats.

Mr. Dana called for a division of the question.

The question was accordingly divided, and on concurring in so much of the report as appropriates 150,000 dollars for fortifications, a debate of considerable length took place.

Mr. Olin opposed a concurrence, and contended that the sum was much too large Great towns are seldom or never destroyed in war. For example, none of our considerable seaport towns have been destroyed in any former war, though the country has been settled nearly two hundred years, and they have been always exposed to the incursions of an enemy. He was also opposed to building gunboats. If two hundred were considered sufficient for our protection in time of war, seventy must be a respectable peace establishment. Mr. O. spoke at considerable length.

Mr. R. Nelson would not have risen at this time, but he had been informed that, during his absence, certain gentlemen who had misunderstood or misrepresented him, had amused themselves by commenting on his observations as to running away on the approach of danger. He had said, or intended to say, when this subject was under discussion on a former day, that if we should be invaded by a large force, it would be better to retire into the country and there meet the enemy, than to pen ourselves up in fortified towns, and there be taken prisoners.

If you intend to fortify the whole coast, this sum is totally inadequate. If designed merely for the protection of New York, it is thrown away; for five millions would not fortify New York against a competent force.

Mr. J. Randolph was sorry that the voice of his friend from Vermont, (Mr. Olin,) prevented him from being heard by the whole House, because his observations completely evinced the futility of the bill reported by the Committee. He also considered the statement of his friend from Maryland (Mr. Nelson) unanswerable; that one hundred and fifty thousand dollars was totally inadequate to the protection of the coast. He considered the grant as a tub thrown to the whale, to amuse him. It could be for no other purpose than to stop clamor. If he wanted to be Speaker the next session, he might, perhaps, join in this proposition. It was a good electioneering scheme. Or, if he were a citizen of some large maritime city, and solicitous for distinction, he might, perhaps, join in this fortification mania. But, in truth, this proposed sum will not establish a defence equal to Corporal Trim's spade and pitchfork, for Uncle Toby's potato garden.

Suppose New York ever so well fortified, an army may land above the city and cut off its intercourse with the country. A fortification there would be made for the enemy. Not a man of our army would have escaped, in the last war, from Long Island, if the enemy's general had not been treacherous to his duty; and all the calamities of that campaign might have been avoided if our army had retreated into the country.

It has been often said that a small force may lay the city of New York under contribution. But, will gentlemen say this, after the ample protection furnished by their favorite gunboats? Mr. R. repeated again, that he considered this grant of no use but to stop clamor. He suspected that the only effectual plan of defending New York, was that proposed on a former day by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Elmer,) to stop up the channel leading to the harbor. This would undoubtedly be an adequate defence, and the learned gentleman who suggested it, must be a disciple of the learned Dr. Last, who had an infallible recipe to cure corns on the toes—to cut the toes off.

Mr. R. considered, that the moment these three hundred thousand dollars were voted for fortifications and gunboats, the money was thrown into the Gulf stream. If two positions could be made out: 1st. The necessity of defence, and 2dly, That our resources are adequate to the object, he would cheerfully join.

Mr. R. vindicated himself from the charge of inconsistency, in voting for the defence of New Orleans, and opposing that of New York. If Savannah or Charleston were the richest, the weakest, and the most likely to be attacked of any part of the United States, (and such is the fact,) would there be any inconsistency in proposing measures of defence for those ports and refusing them to others? So of New Orleans.

New York and New England are not likely to be attacked. Burgoyne's expedition has settled that point. To attack this country in that quarter would be taking the bull by the horns; but if New York is exposed, will their portion of these $150,000 avert the danger?

Mr. Elmer spoke at length against a concurrence.

Mr. Mumford contended that New York was as fully entitled to protection as New Orleans, and more exposed to danger. In a few hours a ship-of-the-line might come from the ocean and place herself before the city. New Orleans was one hundred miles from the sea, and inaccessible to large ships of war.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH replied. The population of New York, and its vicinity, was adequate to its protection. This was not the case with regard to the tide waters of South Carolina and Georgia. They could not defend themselves against the smallest force. The same is true of New Orleans, which is also exposed to a considerable Spanish force in its neighborhood. It is, besides, so far distant from any part of the United States, thickly populated, that it is incapable of timely succor.

Mr. THOMAS referred to the Revolutionary war to evince the efficacy of land batteries. The British were driven from Boston by the batteries on Dorchester heights.

Mr. QUINCY.—I agree with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. RANDOLPH) as to the inadequacy of $150,000 to the object of fortifications, divided among all the ports and harbors of the United States, or even if applied to the single harbor of New York. I feel so utterly indifferent, as to the event of such an appropriation as this, obtained in the manner and under the influences this has been, that I should have given a silent vote upon this question, were it not for an observation which escaped that gentleman, and which seems to me to open an important view of the subject. He told us that if he could be convinced that fortifications were necessary, and that we had the means to erect such as were efficient, he should be willing to vote not such a sum as this, but what would be equal to an adequate defence. This is the true ground on which this question ought to be placed. It is, because fortifications are necessary, and because we have the means perfectly within our power, that the obligation is imperious. Those gentlemen who have denied the necessity of fortifications, have told us that there was no likelihood of invasion; that the Powers of Europe were disposed to be friendly, or were too much engaged in their own disputes, to think of attacking us. Sir, I do not rest the great duty of erecting fortifications in our principal ports and harbors, on the narrow ground of any immediate danger, but on the broad and, in my mind, incontrovertible certainty that, if peace and independence are ours, for any great length of time, it can only be because we possess and exhibit a spirit and ability equal to the maintenance of them. To both of which a foresight of probable evils, and a wise preparation against them, are necessary requisites. I advocate fortifications for our ports and harbors, not because commerce ought to be encouraged, nor because commercial deposits, as such, deserve our peculiar patronage, but because these are constituent ports of the nation, from their nature the most vulnerable ports, the most attractive to the spirit of plunder, and the least able to resist it. Whenever war happens, our enemies will here inflict their surest and deadliest wound. Here, therefore, our national skill should be applied, in times of peace and prosperity; seasonably to prepare against events, certain as to their future existence, and only uncertain as to the time and manner in which they may happen. It is impossible, in considering this question of the necessity of this species of defence, not to have regard to the aspect of our foreign relations. These are distinct and peculiar. And so also are the duties which result from them. Formerly, the martial force of Europe was divided among various independent sovereignties, which, from their real or associated equality, kept each other in check, and prevented any one among them from any great scheme of universal domination.—From the balance of power, resulted a solid security, not only to the nations of Europe, but also to us; and it grew into a maxim, that, in America, we had nothing to do with the quarrels of Europe, except to reap the harvests which its disputes prepared for us. So long as that state of things existed the maxim was wise, and, so far as it inculcates a scrupulous and honest neutrality, it still continues a sound rule of conduct. But it is in vain to deny a conviction, which the apprehensions of every man forces upon him, that the aspect of affairs, in Europe, is altogether different from anything which we, or which the world, ever before witnessed. So far as it respects these United States, there are now but two nations on the globe—a nation of land warriors, and a nation of sea warriors. One people, humanly speaking, omnipotent on one element, while its natural rival is omnipotent on the other. Between these two nations an inveterate, inextinguishable animosity exists. Between them there can be no peace, which is not hollow; no suspension of hostilities which will not be suspicious, not only on account of ancient prejudices, and of recent animosity, but, from this undeniable relation in which they stand to each other, that the one contends for existence, and the other to remove the only remaining limit, so far as relates to the west of Europe, to universal dominion. When such a state of things exists between the only two nations of the globe, with whom we have very intimate relations, is it possible our fate will not materially be affected by the event? Is it possible that, let this contest terminate when it may, how it may, or in favor of whom it may, that the consequences to us will not be eventful? Is it not wise in us to anticipate those consequences, and make a prudent preparation to enable us best to meet them?

I ask, of all possible results of the present contest, which is that which will leave us free and yet at peace; independent, yet bare to every spoiler; which is that event? Is it peace, or is it war? Is it the total subjugation of either nation to the other; and of which? Suppose peace; and this, too, on the best terms, which can now be expected, those of the uti possidetis? In such event, what would be the state of things? On the one side, Bonaparte, virtual master from the Dardanelles to the Baltic, with more than half a million of veterans flushed with victory, and fleshed for plunder, veterans for whom he must find employment, and who have no other trade than that of soldiers. On the other side, Great Britain, the undisputed sovereign of the seas, obliged to enforce her superiority on this element, because, on this depends her safety, and obliged also to monopolize, as far as possible, the commerce of the world, because, on this depends that superiority. In case of peace, what are our prospects? As it respects Great Britain, what is our situation? The second commercial nation on the globe. In the sphere of commerce, her natural, her only rival. Is it not certain that the limitation of the field of commercial enterprise, which we have so long enjoyed, and which would be inevitable in case of peace, would produce great discontent and distress in this country? Is it likely that, urged on by her interests or her jealousy, and conscious of her power, she would claim nothing from us, which we should not be willing to yield? Rather is it not inevitable that, in such case, collisions of mutual interest would bring on irritations, the usual precursors of war? But, suppose this to be the ideal—suppose Great Britain, sensible of the importance of our consumption to her manufactures, is as tractable as we can desire? Is there no cause of apprehension from another quarter? Would Bonaparte, at ease in Europe, long refrain from turning his eye toward this country? Would he not find us rich, and fat, and heavy, from long prosperity? Disinclined to fight about the lands we have, and ready to purchase those we have not? If we had no evidence of his disposition toward this country, is not the very nature of his power such as may put it beyond his reach to interfere with our peace, were he ever so much inclined? It is the nature of the military power, especially such as his, of sudden and self-created elevation, to raise to itself rivals among all the chiefs of the great divisions of the army. The jealous master must remove the object of its fears to a distance. A soldiery, corrupted by victory, must be employed. Why was Bonaparte, with his forty thousand veterans, sent by the Directory to Egypt? To conquer the country? This was the ostensible object. The real one to find employment for a military commander, too popular with his army to be removed, too restless to be idle, too ambitious not to be dreaded. Why was Le Clerc, with another force, sent to St. Domingo? As much from a necessity to rid themselves at home of domestic troubles, as in the hope of regaining lost territory. What is to prevent, in case of peace, a similar danger in France, which can only be removed by some similar expedition, and what security that it will not take its direction this way, as well as any other? Sir, have we seen no evidence of a disposition toward such an enterprise in the present head of the French nation? Previous to the purchase of Louisiana, was not a settlement openly avowed to be intended for that quarter? And was not the apprehension of such a military establishment, among the reasons which led to that purchase? Let peace take place to-morrow, and the prospect of this nation is the most melancholy and alarming. It may be impossible to foresee which nation will interfere with our rights and put our mild spirit to the trial, or in what manner it will be attempted. But, that it will be done by the one or the other, is scarcely problematical.

But, let us grant that peace is impossible. Suppose war continues? Are our prospects brighter? Is it not obvious that, from this moment, the war must assume a new character? Is it not now on the one side a war of extirpation, and on the other for self-existence? On these accounts we cannot reason on this as on common wars. To one nation, in case of defeat, there is no hereafter. Its being is at hazard. We cannot, therefore, expect it will conduct its warlike operations according to the ordinary and received maxims of common prudence. Its struggles must inevitably be convulsive. How long will Bonaparte allow our commerce with Great Britain? If, indeed, at this moment it be permitted, which seems doubtful. If we are denied this intercourse, are we prepared to submit? If we do not, can we keep peace with France? If we do, can we with Great Britain? On the other hand, may we not expect retaliation on our commerce with France? Are we willing to yield the whole with both nations? Can we long carry it on with either without being forced into the war, or without having all the misfortunes of war with none of the fruits of neutrality? It is from this state of our foreign relations, that I argue the necessity of wise preparation for defence, in all the weak parts of the nation; those which are most exposed; those which constitute the frontier; and which, from their riches, most allure plunderers. I consider it as a principle, that a nation, rich and enterprising as is the American, and placed, by its commercial relations, in the midst of martial nations, cannot long maintain either peace or independence without making a regular preparation for those events which are certain, unless prevented by the spirit which such preparations indicate.

But, the objection urged is not so much to the utility, or the wisdom of fortifications, as to the expense. We have been warned against beginning fortifications, because it is said: "Once enter upon the system, and it must be pursued; 'grant one hundred thousand dollars, and you 'must two hundred thousand, and so on." And, as if all argument was closed by the fact, it is said, "that the protection of all our ports and harbors will cost millions." Sir, I am not disposed to deny what I believe not only to be a fact, but also a fact which it is our duty to make understood by this people.

The adequate defence of the ports and harbors of the United States, such as the commercial cities have a right to demand, will unquestionably cost millions—ought to cost millions—millions cannot be better employed. This, which is urged as a main reason, against beginning fortifications at all, is a principal one in favor of beginning them now, and with a spirit proportionate to the real wealth of the nation, and to the great stake it has in the safety of the cities. Fortifications are permanent objects of defence, destined, not for ourselves only, but for posterity. They require, to their greatest perfection, much time, great labor, long consideration, both as to the nature and location of them, according to the situation of different ports. Materials must be collected, prudential principles established, wise economies adopted. All these are best set on foot at such a time as the present, and in such a situation as is our nation in a time of peace. In a time when the command of surplus revenues will enable us to make the necessary preparations in the most advantageous manner.

When I say that fortifications will cost millions, do I mean to propose such appropriations, or the laying additional taxes? By no means. In this the inexpressableness of this House consists. Every principal commercial city in the United States might be put in an adequate state of defence without laying any additional tax, and without its being felt by the people. From the nature of fortifications, their erection must require many years, in order to their being of real efficacy. If built upon a scale proportionate to the magnitude of the object, a certain appropriation of a definite sum for several years, would alone be requisite, not of the whole expenditure in one year. Of course, the nation could avail itself of the successive revenues of many years, and the sum, though great in the aggregate, yet when apportioned upon the incomes of eight or ten years, would almost be imperceptible. In this point of view, will any man pretend we have not the ability to give an adequate defence to our cities. Sir, the Mediterranean fund, which some wish to abolish; the salt tax alone, which, so far as depends upon this House, is already abolished, would have either of them effected the object within the time in which it is probable the appropriations could have been wisely expended—within ten years either of those sources of revenue would have unquestionably produced from at least seven to ten millions of dollars. In less than such a period such expenditures as the adequate defence of all these cities contemplates, could not be advantageously applied. And, in that time, the expenditure of from seven to ten millions of dollars would put every commercial city in an adequate state of defence.

Thus much I thought it proper to state, by way of reply to the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. J. Randolph,) and to show both that fortifications were necessary, that we had the means in our hands, and that the present was the time most propitious to their commencement.

Mr. Smilie observed that, in the first place, he had no ambition to fill the Speaker's chair; and, secondly, that he had no electioneering object in view.

Fortifications, he considered, could be of no use except against marauders, but such was the present situation of Europe, that we could be in no danger. Besides, the present mode is to take armies, and fortifications fall of course.

The President has called for so much. (Three hundred thousand dollars.) Mr. S. was willing to give some of it for fortifications, and leave the rest of it for gunboats, seeing it would not make any difference in the whole expense.

In reply to Mr. Quincy, Mr. S. said that Bonaparte had his hands full; besides, he had higher objects in view than the United States; and, as we had made peace with England, there could be no danger to us from the nations of Europe.

Mr. Dana inquired, if it would be in order to move an amendment to the report, by striking out $150,000, and inserting a larger sum?

The Speaker replied in the negative.

Mr. Thomas suggested, whether the object could not be compassed, by moving to strike out "one," and inserting "two, three, or any larger number?"

The Speaker considered this also out of order. It had been the practise to regard numbers as incapable of a division.

Mr. Dana inquired, if there were any method of procuring a larger sum, except by disagreeing to the report?

The Speaker replied in the negative. The question must be first taken on the sum reported, ($150,000.) If that is disagreed to, any other sum can then be moved.

Mr. Dana deemed the sum reported totally inadequate to the object, and desired a much larger sum. Whatever might be the views of the various sections of the ruling party in the State of New York, it was no concern to him. He was solicitous for the general defence of the country on a liberal and adequate scale. He concluded with declaring that he should vote against concurring in the report, with a view to move a larger sum.

Mr. Masters contended that the alarm in New York was not excited for an electioneering trick. The clamor was justly founded, and would always exist, so long as they were unprotected. We have abundant means of defence. Above four millions are now in the Treasury.

Mr. Cook was sorry the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. J. Randolph) had impeached the motives of those in favor of the report. Mr. C. would only say, that the elections were over at the Eastward. He believed they had not yet taken place in the South.

The question on concurring with the report of the Committee of the Whole, in appropriating $150,000 for fortifications, was taken by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 72, nays 44, as follows:

The next question was on concurring in the report, to appropriate $150,000 to building thirty gunboats.

Mr. Dana considered that it would be better to provide the materials for gunboats, and build only in case of exigency, than to build them immediately, and they might not be wanted, and would be built only to rot in our harbors. He, therefore, moved to amend the report, by striking out "build" and insert "purchase the materials for." Should the gunboats be wanted, the materials might be soon put together.

Mr. Alston opposed the motion, on the ground that the boats could not be constructed in season.

Mr. Dana replied; when the question was taken and lost—yeas 30, nays 78, as follows:

Yeas—Silas Betton, William A. Burwell, Martin Chittenden, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, jun., Caleb Ellis, Ebenezer Elmer, William Ely, James Fisk, Silas Halsey, James Holland, David Hough, Walter Jones, Duncan MacFarland, Robert Marion, Josiah Masters, Jonathan O. Varnum, Daniel C. Verplanck, John Whitehill, David R. Williams, Marmaduke Williams, Nathan Williams, Alexander Wilson, and Joseph Winston.

Mr. Goldsborough hoped every part of this important bill, on which the whole national defence was considered to depend, would be treated alike. He, therefore, called for the yeas and nays on the section relative to gunboats. Everything now, is said to be predicated on the principles of economy. Hence, fortifications are abandoned, and gunboats substituted. The President, however, informs us that, for the safe-keeping of these gunboats, they must be protected by being put under cover. A house must, then, be built for every boat. What will these houses cost? With the land for them, they will, perhaps, cost more than the boats themselves. So much for economy.

The section relative to gunboats was concurred in—yeas 68, nays 36, as follows:

Yeas—Evan Alexander, Isaac Anderson, John Archer, Joseph Barker, William W. Bibb, Barnabas Bidwell, John Blake, jun., Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, John Chandler, Matthew Clay, George Clinton, jun., John Clopton, Frederick Conrad, Orchard Cook, Leonard Covington, Richard Cutts, Peter Early, John W. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

[Note.—The bill afterward passed in this form, and was transmitted to the Senate for concurrence, who struck out the section relative to gunboats, and agreed to the other relative to fortifications. On the last day of the session, the bill was returned with this amendment to the House of Representatives, who concurred therein by a majority of three—ayes 39, noes 36.]

VIRGINIA MILITARY WARRANTS.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill relative to Virginia Military Land Warrants were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. J. Randolph observed that the bill received from the Senate, the object of which was to prevent intrusions on public lands, had been before the Committee on Public Lands for a considerable time. As it was his wish that this bill should be decided on while the House was full, as the Committee on Public Lands would find much occupation in the bill last referred to them, he moved that they should be discharged from the further consideration of the former bill, with a view of having it referred to a Committee of the whole House.

A motion to adjourn having been made and carried, no question was taken on Mr. Randolph's motion.

Tuesday, February 24.

The Speaker presented to the House certain resolutions of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, which were received and read, stating their attachment to the Union, their confidence in the Legislative and Executive Departments of Government, and their determination to oppose, with their lives and fortunes, as well all internal conspiracy as foreign encroachments.—Laid on the table.

Mr. Quincy, from the committee appointed on the eighth ultimo, presented a bill disapproving of an act passed by the Governor and Judges of the Territory of Michigan, entitled "An act concerning the Bank of Detroit;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. Thomas, from the committee appointed on the twentieth instant, presented a bill authorizing the discharge of Gilbert Drake from his imprisonment; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. Bassett, from the committee to whom was referred, on the sixteenth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled 'An act to reduce the expenses attending the administration of justice in the District of Columbia," reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill do lie on the table

Mr. Bassett, from the same committee, to whom was referred, on the sixteenth instant, the bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the payment of the expense incurred by the military preparations for the defence of the Territory of Michigan against hostile Indians, in the year one thousand eight hundred and six. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and William Eaton. The bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. Holmes, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill concerning invalid pensioners; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole this day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill sent from the House, entitled "An act allowing an additional compensation to the Judges of the Mississippi Territory, and extending the right of suffrage therein," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States was read the third time.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act making further appropriations for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States, and for building gunboats."

PUBLIC DEBT.

An engrossed bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States," was read the third time, and on the question that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 15, as follows:

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress; when the House adjourned.

Wednesday, February 25.

An engrossed bill providing for the payment of the expense incurred by the military preparations for the defence of the Territory of Michigan, against hostile Indians, in the year 1806, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. John Randolph, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for carrying into effect certain treaties with the Cherokee and Piankeshaw tribes of Indians; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. John Randolph, from the same committee, presented a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate and fix the compensation to clerks, and to authorize the laying out of certain public roads, and for other purposes;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill making provision for the disposal of the public lands, situated between the United States military tract and the Connecticut Reserve, and for other purposes. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia Military Warrants, and for returning the surveys thereon to the Secretary of the Department of War." The Senate have passed the bill sent from this House, entitled "An act repealing the acts laying duties on salt, and continuing in force, for a further time the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate agree to the amendments and modification proposed by the joint committee of conference to the amendments of this House to the bill, entitled "An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight," and desire the concurrence of this House therein.

Mr. Jeremiah Morrow, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill extending the time for locating Virginia Military Land Warrants, agreeing to some, and disagreeing to others; in which report the House, after a short discussion, concurred.

GENERAL EATON.

The bill authorizing the settlement of the accounts between the United States and William Eaton, was read the third time and passed—ayes sixty-four.

On agreeing to the title—

Mr. John Randolph said he conceived the title to be extremely improper, and he hoped some gentleman would suggest a proper alteration. He believed the bill had passed by surprise. It was not so much a bill to settle the accounts of William Eaton, as to rip up the settled forms of the Treasury, and to transfer the accountable duties of the Treasury to the Department of State. It would be a stain upon the statute book.

The question was then taken on the title; which was agreed to—ayes 63.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. Jeremiah Morrow, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States unauthorized by law, reported the same with sundry amendments.

Mr. Jeremiah Morrow moved the reference of this report to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. John Randolph hoped the report would not be referred to a Committee of the Whole, as the bill involved no appropriation of money, and as past experience had shown that when the House got into Committee of the Whole, they scarcely knew how to get out of it. Did time admit, he should have no objection to the course proposed. But this was not the case. The bill could be as well discussed in the House as in Committee. He, therefore, trusted it would not be referred to a Committee of the Whole, as that course might defeat its passage this session.

Mr. Quincy hoped the bill would be referred to a Committee of the Whole, for if there was any bill of importance brought before the House during this session, this was one, which he therefore thought merited a full consideration.

Mr. Gregg said he was indifferent which course was pursued. He agreed that the bill was one of the greatest importance which had been before the Legislature this session. He, indeed, considered it more important than all the rest of the bills. He was, therefore, for giving it a preference over all others. He hoped it would be passed during the session, but still he was willing to afford gentlemen a full opportunity of adducing whatever their ingenuity could suggest.

Mr. Smilie observed that, in an early period of the session, he should have no objection to this bill going to a Committee of the Whole. But he desired gentlemen to recollect the situation of the House. He understood that there were sixty bills remaining undecided on, many of which it was highly desirable to pass. Only six days of the session remained; there, therefore, was no time to consume in Committees of the Whole. He said he believed the bill, together with the amendments, might receive sufficient consideration without going into Committee of the Whole.

The motion to refer the report to a Committee of the Whole was disagreed to—ayes 30.

POST ROADS.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the House proceeded to consider the Post Office bill.

The SPEAKER stated that there was no report from the Committee of the Whole, and that the amendments so largely discussed yesterday were not before the House. The subject was, therefore, in the same situation as before the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH moved to postpone the bill indefinitely, on the ground that the subject was less important than many others, and the time remaining was not sufficient to despatch all the public business.

This motion gave rise to a debate of considerable length. The motion was negatived—ayes 48, noes 54.

The bill was then again referred to a Committee of the Whole, and the House immediately went into Committee upon it.

The Committee went through the bill and reported it with many amendments. The House proceeded to consider the report, and expunged a large proportion of the amendments.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH observed that this was an extraordinary bill, and was passing in an extraordinary manner. It gave New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, and some other Northern States, a large number of post roads, and not one to Virginia. It was not wonderful that this subject was pressed on by certain gentleman. If it would not be considered as too alarming a proof of Virginia influence on this floor, he would propose a new road from Prince Edward county, in the district which he represented, to Petersburg. Mr. R. spoke at considerable length.

Mr. BLOUNT was against the motion, because the gentleman had proved so fully the errors of the bill, that he hoped it would be rejected.

Mr. LYON said it was the most partial bill he ever knew.

Mr. R. NELSON expressed a wish that the amendment would be rejected. The bill was almost as bad as it could be; he hoped it would be made still worse, and so its rejection insured.

Mr. BLOUNT observed that many large counties in the Southern States had no post roads, while scarcely a town in the Northern States was without one.

Mr. QUINCY repelled the suggestion of partiality by recurring to former laws and showing that the Southern States had been previously accommodated better than the Northern States.

Messrs. SHILIE, FISK, FINDLEY, and MASTERS, spoke. The debate was protracted to a considerable length, but not one word was said as to the amendment proposed; but every observation went to vindicate, repel, or explain, the suggestion of partiality.

The amendment was lost—ayes 35.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH said this was a new sort of political arithmetic. The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. FISK) had said that three roads were discontinued in that State, and four only established, so that the gain was only one. In Virginia you discontinue four established roads, and give us no new one, though we have claimed several. We must work negative quantities; we are minus four. He wished to know how the equation was to be adjusted and managed. Mr. R. concluded a long speech by proposing a new section which went to forbid the carriers of the mail deviating from the old established routes, under penalty of twenty dollars for each offence.

This motion was intended to coerce the mail carriers to go through Colchester, and not through Occoquan, Virginia.

The debate was continued to a considerable length, in course of which, Mr. RANDOLPH pronounced the road police in Virginia to be most detestable.

Mr. DAWSON supported Mr. RANDOLPH, and Messrs. LEWIS and QUINCY replied. As soon as Mr. RANDOLPH had concluded his third speech on the motion, an adjournment was called for and carried—ayes 60.

THURSDAY, February 26.

An engrossed bill making provision for the disposal of the public lands situated between the United States' military tract and the Connecticut Reserve, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PARKE, from the committee to whom were referred, on the twentieth instant, the petition of sundry inhabitants of Randolph county, in the Indiana Territory, made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That it is expedient to divide the Indiana Territory.

Mr. PARKE presented to the House a petition of the inhabitants of the Illinois and the village of Peorai, in the Indiana Territory, which was received and read, praying that the Board of Commissioners established at Kaskaskia, may be empowered to examine and decide on their claims to lands in the said Territory, which they have respectively settled and improved.—Laid on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, of the eighteenth instant, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, "authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be published the report and chart of the survey of the coast of North Carolina, made by Thomas Coles and Jonathan Price, under the act of Congress, passed at the last session, for that purpose," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a public road from Cumberland in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the resolution of this House, in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, "to publish the report and chart of the survey of the coast of North Carolina:" Whereupon the said amendments being again twice read, were, on the question severally put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making appropriation for the support of Government during the year one thousand eight hundred and seven. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks, and to authorize the laying out of certain public roads, and for other purposes. The bill was reported with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

CLAIM OF M. BEAUMARCHAIS.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, transmitting a memorial of the French Minister, on the subject of the claim of Amelie Eugenie de Beaumarchais, heir and representative of the late Caron de Beaumarcahis, made the following report:

This claim was presented to Congress at their last session by the agent of the representative of the late Caron de Beaumarchais, and a report was made thereon by the Committee of Claims, which was not finally acted upon by the House. The documents presented with that report, and the memorial of the French Minister, transmitted with the President's Message, contain a full statement of all the material facts and principles involved in the consideration of the case. As the papers accompany the present report, your committee do not deem it necessary to detail particularly the circumstances attending the charge of one million of livres, made of the United States, in their account with Caron de Beaumarchais, (which is the foundation of the present application.) The claimants have uniformly contested the correctness of this charge, declaring that Mr. Beaumarchais had settled with the French Government for the same, conformably to the tenor of his receipt. The substance of this declaration is now confirmed by the French Government, through their Minister, in the following words:

"That the million given on the 10th of June, 1776, to M. de Beaumarchais, was employed in a secret service; that an account of it has been rendered to the King, and approved by him; and that it was not given on account of supplies furnished by the said Beaumarchais to the United States."

The source whence this declaration proceeds renders it unnecessary to allude to any corroborative circumstances in support of the fact; but, as questions of law may arise in investigating the case, your committee think the course most consistent with the principles of justice, to which the United States have always adhered, would be to submit the claim generally to the consideration of the Secretary of State, with instructions to report to Congress at their next session; that he might consult the Attorney General upon any questions of law arising in the course of the investigation, and furnish Congress with any other information that would tend to elucidate the subject. They therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Message of the President of the United States, transmitting a memorial of the French Minister on the subject of the claim of Amelie Eugenie de Beaumarchais, legal representative of the late Caron de Beaumarchais, be referred to the Secretary of State, and that he be directed to report thereon to Congress at their next session.

The report was agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF SLAVES.

The bill prohibiting the slave trade, as received from the Senate, was considered. The bill, modified according to the recommendation of the committee of conference, contained a provision forbidding the transportation of slaves coastwise, in vessels under forty tons, with a view to sale.

Mr. EARLY was decidedly hostile to the provision. He spoke at length against it, and in the course of his remarks, he said the door of the bill was wide open to evasion, and it would not prevent the introduction of a single slave.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH extended the arguments of Mr. EARLY. The provision of the bill touched the right of private property. He feared lest, at a future period, it might be made the pretext of universal emancipation. He had rather lose the bill, he had rather lose all the bills of the session, he had rather lose every bill passed since the establishment of the Government, than agree to the provision contained in this slave bill. It went to blow up the Constitution in ruins. Mr. R. said, if ever the time of disunion between the States should arrive, the line of severance would be between the slaveholding and the non-slaveholding States.

Mr. D. R. WILLIAMS spoke vehemently against this provision of the bill. The whole bill was not worth a single farthing. We bawled, said he, Florida! Florida! but you would not listen to us.

[NOTE.—Mr. EARLY had stated that the bill, as drawn, did not forbid the introduction of slaves from Florida.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH vindicated the bill from the objections urged against it, and insisted that the provision in question was both Constitutional and necessary to the successful operation of the bill.

Mr. J. RANDOLPH replied at length. He observed that when the freemen of the Southern States should depend for assistance on the North ern against their slaves, he should despair. All he asked was, that they should remain neutral; that they would not erect themselves into an abolition society. Mr. R. also observed, that he considered it no imputation to be a slaveholder, more than to be born in a particular country. It was a thing with which they had no more to do than with their own procreation.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Goldsborough, Alston, and Sloan, in favor of concurring with the Senate; and Messrs. Early and Alexander against it.

The question, after a long debate, was at length taken by yeas and nays, and carried—yeas 63, nays 49, as follows:

Yeas—Willis Alston, jun., John Archer, David Bard, Joseph Barker, George M. Bedinger, Barnabas Bidwell, John Blake, jr., Robert Brown, George W. The Senate having agreed to the modification, the bill was passed.

DUTIES ON SALT.

The Message from the Senate, stating that they had passed the bill sent from the House for the repeal of the acts laying duties on salt, and for a continuance of the Mediterranean fund until the end of the next session of Congress, with amendments, was considered.

The first amendment of the Senate having been put, Mr. J. Randolph called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Alston said if he understood the amendment, instead of repealing the whole duty on salt, it only repealed the duty of 8 cents, and suffered the other duty of 12 cents to remain. He said his opinion was that it would be better to let the Senate reject the bill sent from the House, or pass it altogether. No person could be more anxious to reduce the duty on salt than he was; but he believed if they persisted in the course which they had originally taken, the Senate would recede from their amendment.

Mr. Olin said when this subject was on a former occasion before the House, he had declined saying anything. He would now however take the liberty of offering his sentiments on the subject.

This tax, said Mr. Olin, may be sport to others, but it is death to us. There is no other article on which duty operates so injuriously. The whole State which I represent, if you deprive them of salt, will not be worth a cent. We can neither raise stock nor plough the soil without the aid of salt. When this article is so necessary to the existence of the nation, I am at a loss to know how any gentleman can be in favor of its being a dutied article. Its original value in the foreign market is about 12 cents a bushel; the duty upon it is consequently 160 per cent. Where in our catalogue of imported articles can we find any one so highly dutied? Some gentlemen have however informed us, that considerable duties are paid on tea, coffee, and sugar, in Boston, and other Atlantic towns in the United States, but do not gentlemen know that these articles are also consumed in other places. I will ask gentlemen also whether this is an equal tax, as on the seashore there is scarcely any occasion for it, while in the interior it is absolutely indispensable. If salt was free as air with us, the net proceeds of our stock would be one-fourth greater than it is at present. Mr. O. here mentioned the enormous price which had been at particular periods paid for this article; and observed that he had seen fourteen bushels of wheat, and even a good cow, given for a single bushel of salt!

The gentlemen talk of war. If war is to happen, it will in my opinion be better to lay out money for establishing a magazine of salt, than gunpowder. We ought never to pay a tax on any real necessary brought into the country; and yet we have imposed upon salt about eight times the usual tax. This tax is peculiarly unequal. You may take one-third of the nation, and you will find it pays three-fourths of the whole tax. Before it is used by the consumer, it is sold three or four times, and every seller puts an additional premium on it. In the State I represent, we consume about 200,000 bushels, the duty on which, from what I have observed, may be estimated at nearly 50 cents; from which, making a proper deduction, there will still remain a tax of $80,000 while the whole civil list of the State does not amount to $20,000. Feeling as I do, I wish the House to adhere to their bill, and run the risk of the Senate giving way.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on concurring in the first amendment of the Senate—yeas 15, nays 89, as follows:

Nays—Willis Alston, jun., Isaac Anderson, John Archer, David Bard, Joseph Barker, Burwell Bassett, George M. Bedinger, Silas Betton, William W. Bibb, Barnabas Bidwell, John Blake, jun., Thomas Blount, Robert Brown, William A. Burwell, William Butler, John Chandler, Martin Chittenden, John Claiborne, Frederick Conrad, Ezra Darby, John Dawson, Elias Earle, Peter Early, James Elliot, Caleb Ellis, Ebenezer Elmer, William Ely, William Findley, James Fisk, James M. Garnett, Charles Goldsborough, Peterson Goodwyn, Andrew Gregg, Silas Halsey, James Holland, David Holmes, David Hough, James Kelly, Thomas Kenan, Nehemiah Knight, John Lambert, Joseph Lewis, jun., Henry W. Livingston, Edward Lloyd, Duncan McFarland, Robert Marion, Nicholas R. Moore, Thomas Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, John Morrow, Jonathan O. Mosely, Gurdon S. Mumford, Jeremiah Nelson, Thomas Newton, jun., Gideon Olin, Timothy Pitkin, jun., John Porter, John Pugh, John Randolph, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Jacob Richards, Peter Sailly, Martin G. Thompson, Thomas W. Thompson, Joseph B. Varnum, Peleg Wadsworth, John Whitehill, Robert Whitehill, Eliphalet Wickes, David R. Williams, Marmaduke Williams, Richard Winn, Joseph Winston, and Thomas Wynns.

The second amendment of the Senate, to strike out the second section, was disagreed to without a division.

The third amendment of the Senate proposed to continue the Mediterranean fund until the 31st of December next, instead of continuing to the end of the next session of Congress.

Mr. J. Randolph said, he did not see the purpose for which this amendment was made. He believed it was no part of the intention of the Senate to relieve the public burdens. He hoped the bill would be suffered to die a natural death.

Mr. Goldsborough thought the amendment of the Senate correct. His idea was not to impose burdens unnecessarily on the people.

A concurrence in this amendment was agreed to—ayes 33.
